

BOHN'S STANDARD LIBRARY

HISTORY OF THE POPES

VOL. I

GEORGE BELL AND SONS

LONDON: PORTUGAL ST., LINCOLN'S INN

CAMBRIDGE: DEIGHTON, BELL & CO.

NEW YORK: THE MACMILLAN CO.

BOMBAY: A. H. WHEELER & CO.

Julius II.

From the painting by Raphael in the Vatican Gallery, Florence

THE HISTORY OF THE POPES

DURING THE LAST FOUR CENTURIES

BY

LEOPOLD VON RANKE

MRS. FOSTER'S TRANSLATION REVISED IN ACCORDANCE WITH THE LATEST GERMAN EDITION BY

G. R. DENNIS

VOL. I

LONDON
GEORGE BELL & SONS

1908

PRINTED BY WILLIAM CLOWES AND SONS, LIMITED, LONDON AND BECCLES.

NOTE

RANKE'S "History of the Popes" was first published in 1834. It was subjected to considerable revision in the sixth edition (1874), and the author at the same time brought the work up-to-date by the addition of two sections entitled "Church and State under Pius IX," and "The Vatican Council." Ranke died in 1888, and the last edition which he revised was the Eighth (1885).

The present translation is that of Mrs. Foster, which was first issued in Bohn's Standard Library in 1848, and has passed through numerous editions. The opportunity has, however, been taken to revise it throughout, and to bring it into accordance with the latest German edition, both by the inclusion of the new sections at the end, and by incorporating the various additions and alterations made throughout the book since it was first published. Thanks are due to the German publishers, Herren Duncker und Humblot, Leipzig, for allowing the new matter to be translated.

Mrs. Foster provided translations of all the quotations from original documents given in the notes, and in many cases she omitted the originals. In the present edition the original extracts have all been restored, but it has not been thought necessary to give translations of quotations from French or Latin documents, nor of such Italian extracts as are practically translated or paraphrased in the text.

A new and enlarged Index to the whole work, based on that in the latest German edition, has been added.

G. R. D.

1908.

AUTHOR'S PREFACE

THE power of Rome in ancient times and in the middle ages is universally known: in modern times, also, she has exercised renewed influence over the world. After the decline of her importance, in the first half of the sixteenth century, she once more raised herself to be the centre of faith and opinion to the Romance nations of southern Europe, and made bold, and often successful, attempts to recover her dominion over those of the north.

This period of a revived spiritual and temporal power,—its renovation and internal development,—its progress and decline,—it is my purpose to describe, at least in outline; an undertaking which, however imperfectly it may be performed, could never have been attempted, had I not found opportunity to avail myself of certain materials hitherto unknown. My first duty is to give a general indication of these materials and their sources.

In an earlier work¹ I have already stated the contents of our Berlin MSS.; but Vienna is incomparably richer than Berlin in treasures of this kind.

Besides its essentially German character, Vienna possesses also a European element: the most diversified manners and languages meet in all classes, from the highest to the lowest, and Italy in particular is fully and vividly represented. The collections in this city also present a comprehensiveness of character, attributable to the policy of the state and its geographical position; its ancient connection with Spain, Belgium, and Lombardy; and its proximity to, and ecclesiastical relations with, Rome. The Viennese have from the earliest times displayed a taste for collecting and preserving. Hence, even the original and purely national collections of the Imperial Library are of great value. To these, various foreign collections have since been added. A number of volumes similar to the Berlin Informationi were purchased at Modena, from the house of Rangone; from Venice were acquired the invaluable manuscripts of the Doge Marco Foscarini, including his materials for a continuation of his literary undertaking, the "Italian Chronicles," of which no trace is elsewhere to be found; and the bequest of Prince Eugene added a rich collection of historical and political manuscripts, which had been formed, with comprehensive judgment, by that distinguished statesman. The reader examines the catalogues with feelings of pleasure and hope, perceiving the many unexplored sources of knowledge that will enable him to supply the deficiencies manifest in almost all printed works of modern history. A whole futurity of study! And at the distance of a few steps only, Vienna presents still more important literary stores. The imperial archives contain, as might be expected, the most authentic and valuable records for the elucidation of German and general history, and more particularly of that of Italy. It is true that the greater part of the Venetian archives have been restored, after many wanderings, to Venice; but there still remains in Vienna a mass of Venetian manuscripts far from unimportant; despatches, original or copied, and abstracts of them made for the use of the state, and called rubricaries; reports, which, in many instances, are the only copies extant; official registers of public functionaries, chronicles, and diaries. The details to be found in the present volumes, relating to Gregory XIII and Sixtus V, are for the most part derived from the archives of Vienna. I cannot sufficiently acknowledge the unconditional liberality with which I was permitted to have access to these treasures.

¹ In the Preface to the "Ottoman and Spanish Empires in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries."

And perhaps I ought here to mention the many and various aids afforded me in my work, both at home and abroad; but I feel restrained by a scruple, whether well-founded or not, I am unable to decide. For I should have to mention so many names, some of them of great eminence, as would give my gratitude the appearance of vain-glory ; and a work, which has every reason to present itself modestly, might assume an air of ostentation ill suited to its pretensions.

Next to Vienna, my attention was principally directed to Venice and Rome.

It was formerly the almost invariable practice of great houses in Venice to form a cabinet of manuscripts, as an adjunct to the library. It was in the nature of things that these would relate principally to the affairs of the republic. They served to shew the part taken by the respective families in public affairs, and were preserved as records and memorials of the house, for the instruction of its younger members. Some of these private collections still remain, and I had access to several ; but much the larger number were destroyed in the general ruin of 1797, or since. If more have been preserved than might have been expected, the gratitude of the world is due chiefly to the librarians of St. Mark's, who laboured to save, from the universal wreck, whatever the utmost resources of their institution would permit them to secure. Accordingly this library possesses a considerable store of manuscripts, which are indispensable to the inner history of the city and state, and are valuable aids towards that of Europe. But the inquirer must not expect too much from it : it is a somewhat recent acquisition ; gathered, almost at hazard, from private collections ; incomplete and without unity of plan. It is not to be compared with the riches of the state archives, especially as these are now arranged. I have already given a sketch of the Venetian archives, in my inquiry into the conspiracy of 1618, and will not repeat what I there said. For my Roman investigations, the reports of the ambassadors returning from Rome were above all desirable ; but I had great reason to wish for assistance from other collections, because none are free from lacunae, and these archives must necessarily have sustained losses in their many wanderings. In different places I gathered together forty-eight reports relating to Rome : the oldest dating from the year 1500 ; nineteen of the sixteenth, twenty-one of the seventeenth century ; these formed an almost complete series, having only a few breaks here and there. Of the eighteenth century there were it is true only eight, but these, too, were very instructive and welcome. In the majority of cases I saw and used the originals. They contain a great mass of interesting information, based on personal observation, and forgotten when the contemporary generation passed away. It was from these that I first derived the idea of a continued narrative, and these also inspired me with courage to attempt it.

It will be obvious that Rome alone could supply the means for verifying and extending these materials.

But was it to be expected that a foreigner, and one professing a different faith, would there be permitted to have free access to the public collections, for the purpose of revealing the secrets of the papacy? This would not perhaps have been so ill-advised as it may appear, since no search can bring to light any thing worse than what is already assumed by unfounded conjecture, and received by the world as established truth. But I cannot boast of having had any such permission. I was enabled to take cognizance of the treasures contained in the Vatican, and to use a number of volumes suited to my purpose; but the freedom of access which I could have wished was by no means accorded. Fortunately, however, other collections were thrown open to me, from which I could acquire information, which, if not complete, was very extensive and authentic. In the flourishing times of aristocracy, more particularly in the seventeenth century, it was customary throughout Europe for the great families, who had administered the affairs of state, to retain possession of some of the public documents. This practice prevailed in Rome to a greater extent, perhaps, than in any other state. The kinsmen of the pope, who in all ages exercised supreme power, usually bequeathed as an heirloom to the princely houses they founded, a large part of the state papers accumulated during their administration. These constituted part of the family endowments. In the palaces which they erected, a few rooms, usually in the upper part of the building, were always reserved for books and manuscripts, which each succeeding generation contributed to enrich. Thus, to a certain extent the private collections of Rome may be regarded as the public ones ; since the archives of state were dispersed, without any objection being made to the practice, in the houses of the various families who had exercised the control of public affairs ; much in the same manner as the redundancy of public wealth was suffered to flow into the coffers of the papal families, and certain private galleries, such as the Borghese or Doria, became greatly superior to the Vatican, both in extent and historical importance, though the latter is distinguished by its selection of masterpieces. The manuscripts which are preserved in the Barberini, Chigi, Altieri, Albani, and Corsini palaces, are accordingly of inestimable value, for the aid they give towards a history of the popes, their state and church. The state record office, recently established, is particularly important for its collection of registers illustrative of the middle ages ; which, as regards that period, will still repay the inquirer ; but, so far as my knowledge extends, I do not believe that much is to be gained from it for later centuries. Its value sinks into insignificance, unless I have been purposely deceived, when compared with the wealth and magnificence of private collections. Each of these comprises, as may be readily supposed, that epoch in which the pope of the family reigned ; but as the kindred of each pontiff usually retained an eminent station ; as men are in general desirous of extending and completing a collection once begun, and as opportunities were frequent in Rome, from the literary traffic in manuscripts established there ; so the whole of these private collections possess many valuable documents illustrating other periods, both proximate and remote. The richest of all (in consequence of important bequests) is the Barberini collection ; that of the Corsini Palace has been remarkable from its commencement for the care and judgment with which it has been formed. I was fortunately permitted to use all these collections, as well as others of less importance ; and in some instances with unrestricted freedom. An unhoped-for harvest of authentic and suitable materials thus lay before me. As, for example, the correspondence of the nunciatures, with the Instructions given to them, and the reports which were brought back ; circumstantial biographies of different popes, written with all the more freedom, because not intended for the public; lives of distinguished cardinals; official and private journals; investigations of particular circumstances and transactions; special opinions and deliberations; reports on the administration of the provinces, their trade and manufactures; statistical tables, and accounts of receipts and disbursements. These documents, for the most part entirely unknown, were prepared by men practically acquainted with their subject, and of a credibility which, though it does not supersede the necessity for a searching and critical examination, is equal to that usually accorded to the testimony of well-informed contemporaries. The oldest of these MSS. of which I made use, related to the conspiracy of the Porcari against Nicholas V. Of the fifteenth century I met with only a few; but on entering the sixteenth, they became more numerous and more comprehensive at every step. Through the whole course of the seventeenth century, during which so little is known with certainty respecting Rome, they afford information, all the more valuable because of its previous dearth. After the commencement of the eighteenth century, they decrease in number and intrinsic value; but at that time the Roman state and court had already lost much of their influence and importance. I will go through those Roman MSS., as well as the Venetian, in detail, at the end of the work, and will there note whatever seems to me worthy of attention, and which I could not introduce in the course of the narrative. The large mass of materials available, both manuscript and printed, renders a stringent condensation indispensable.

An Italian or Roman, a Catholic, would enter on the subject in a spirit very different from mine. By indulging in expressions of personal veneration, or, perhaps, in the present state of opinion, of personal hatred, he would give to his work a peculiar, and, no doubt, more brilliant colouring; on many points he would be more elaborate, more ecclesiastical, more local. In these respects, a Protestant, a North German, cannot be expected to compete with him. He regards the papal power with feelings of more indifference; and must, from the first, renounce such warmth of expression as arises from partiality or hostility, although it might, perhaps, produce a certain impression in Europe. For mere matters of ecclesiastical or canonical detail, we can have no true sympathy; on the other hand, our position affords us different, and, if I am not mistaken, purer and less partial views of history. For what is there in the present day that can make the history of the papal power of importance to us? Not its particular relation to ourselves; for it no longer exercises any essential influence, nor does it create in us solicitude of any kind; the times are past in which we had any thing to fear; we now feel ourselves perfectly secure.¹ Popery can now inspire us with no other interest than what results from the development of its history and its former influence.

The papal power was, however, not so unchangeable as is commonly supposed. If we consider the question apart from those principles upon which its existence depends, and which it cannot abandon without consigning itself to destruction, we shall find it affected to its very core, and as deeply as any other power, by the various destinies to which the nations of Europe have been subjected. As the history of the world has varied; as one nation or another has gained the ascendancy; as the fabric of social life has been disturbed; so also has the papal power been affected: its maxims, its objects, and its claims, have undergone essential changes; and its influence, above all, has been subjected to the greatest variations. If we cast a glance at the long catalogue of names so frequently repeated through successive ages, from Pius I in the second century, to our contemporaries, Pius VII and VIII in the nineteenth, we receive an impression of uninterrupted stability; but we must not permit ourselves to be misled by this semblance of constancy. The popes of different periods are, in fact, distinguished by differences as strongly marked, as those existing between the various dynasties of a kingdom. To us, who are lookers-on at a distance, it is precisely these mutations that present the most interesting subject of contemplation. We see in them a portion of the history of the world, and of the general progress of mankind; and this is true, not only of periods when Rome held undisputed sovereignty, but also, and perhaps even more remarkably, of those shaken by the conflicting forces of action and counter-action, such as the times which the present work is more especially intended to comprise,—the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries;—times when the papacy was menaced and endangered, yet maintained and fortified itself; nay, even re-extended its influence, striding onward for a period, but at last receding again, and tottering to its fall; times when the mind of the western nations was pre-eminently occupied by ecclesiastical questions; and when that power, which, abandoned and assailed by one party, was upheld and defended with fresh zeal by the other, necessarily assumed a station of high and universal importance. It is from this point of view that our natural position invites us to consider it, and this I will now attempt.

¹ This was written in 1834, at a time when peace existed, or seemed to exist, between Rome and Germany. The preface, here reprinted, reflects, as does the work itself, the feeling of that period. Since then, all is altered. In bringing out a sixth edition, forty years after the first, I find that the strife, which was then dormant, has now broken out into flame. In the book itself, of course, no alteration could be made on this account, but I cannot hide from myself the fact that we have entered upon a new epoch of the papacy. I have only been able to give a general account of its development, maintaining always the objective point of view, which I consistently aimed at from the first. I have even found it advisable to treat of the present pontificate in the same spirit. Accordingly the original title, which connected the work with another publication, and confined it to the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, has been discarded and a more comprehensive one substituted (Note to the sixth edition, 1874).

I think it appropriate to commence by recalling to the memory of my readers the situation of the papal power in the beginning of the sixteenth century, and the course of events which led thereto.

CONTENTS OF VOL. I

	PAGE
AUTHOR'S PREFACE	vii
LIST OF POPES, EMPERORS, AND KINGS OF SPAIN AND FRANCE SINCE THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY	xviii

BOOK I

INTRODUCTION

CHAP. I.—EPOCHS OF THE PAPACY, A.D. I-1500

1. Christianity in the Roman Empire	3
2. The Papacy in Connection with the Frankish Empire	10
3. Relation of the Popes to the German Emperors.—Internal Progress of the Hierarchy	18
4. Contrasts between the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries . .	26

CHAP. II.—THE CHURCH AND HER TERRITORIES IN THE BEGINNING OF THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY

1. Extension of the Ecclesiastical States	34
2. Growth of a Secular Spirit in the Church	45
3. Intellectual Tendency	48
4. Opposition to the Papacy in Germany	59

CHAP. III.—POLITICAL COMPLICATIONS.—CONNECTION BETWEEN THESE AND THE REFORMATION

Under Leo X	63
Under Adrian VI	71
Under Clement VII	77

BOOK II

BEGINNING OF A REGENERATION OF CATHOLICISM

	PAGE
1. Opinions analogous to those of the Protestants entertained in Italy	106
2. Attempts at Internal Reform and a Reconciliation with the Protestants	116
3. New Religious Orders	134
4. Ignatius Loyola	141
5. First Sitzings of the Council of Trent	155
6. The Inquisition	162
7. Further Progress of the Jesuit Institution	169
Conclusion	183

BOOK III

THE POPES ABOUT THE MIDDLE OF THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY

1. Paul III	188
2. Julius III—Marcellus II	214
3. Paul IV	221
4. Remarks on the Progress of Protestantism during the Pontificate of Paul IV	244
5. Pius IV	249
6. Later Sitzings of the Council of Trent	258
7. Pius V	278

BOOK IV

STATE AND COURT—TIMES OF GREGORY XIII AND SIXTUS V

1. Administration of the States of the Church	302
2. Finances	319
3. Gregory XIII	333

CONTENTS OF VOL. I

xvii

	PAGE
4. Sixtus V	348
5. Extirpation of the Banditti	357
6. Leading Characteristics of the Administration	360
7. Finances	368
8. The Public Buildings of Sixtus V	376
9. General Change in the Intellectual Tendency of the Age	386
10. The Curia	399

BOOK V

COUNTER-REFORMATION—FIRST PERIOD, 1563-1589

1. State of Protestantism about the Year 1563	416
2. Resources possessed by the Papacy for Active Conflict	428
3. The First Jesuit Schools in Germany	432
4. Beginning of the Counter-Reformation in Germany	440
5. Troubles in the Netherlands and France	454
6. Resistance of the Protestants in the Netherlands, France, and Germany	464
7. Contrasts exhibited in Other Parts of Europe—Poland— Sweden—England—Switzerland	472
8. Crisis in the Netherlands	484
9. Progress of the Counter-Reformation in Germany	499
10. The League	524
11. Savoy and Switzerland	534
12. Attack on England	536
13. Assassination of Henry III	544

LIST OF POPES,

EMPERORS, AND KINGS OF SPAIN AND FRANCE SINCE THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY

	POPES.	EMPERORS.	KINGS OF SPAIN.	KINGS OF FRANCE.
1492	Alexander VI (Lenzuoli, afterwards Borgia)	Frederick IV	Ferdinand V	Charles VIII
1493		Maximilian I
1498				Louis XII
1503	Pius III (Todeschini)
1503	Julius II (della Rovere)
1513	Leo X (de' Medici)			Francis I
1515			Charles I (Emp. Chas. V)
1516
1519		Charles V
1522	Adrian VI (of Utrecht)
1523	Clement VII (de' Medici)
1534	Paul III (Farnese)			Henry II
1547
1550	Julius III (del Monte)
1555	Marcellus II (Cervini)
1555	Paul IV (Caraffa)		Philip II
1556		Ferdinand I
1558	Pius IV (Medici)			Francis II
1559		Maximilian II		Charles IX
1560
1564	Pius V (Ghislieri)
1566	Gregory XIII (Buoncompagno)
1572				Henry III
1574		Rudolf II
1576
1585	Sixtus V (Peretti, Montalto)			Henry IV
1589
1590	Urban VII (Castagna)
1590	Gregory XIV (Sfondrato)
1591	Innocent IX (Fachinetto)
1592	Clement VIII (Aldobrandini)
1598			Philip III
1605	Leo XI (de' Medici)
1605	Paul V (Borghese)			Louis XIII
1610
1612		Matthias
1619		Ferdinand II
1621	Gregory XV (Ludovisio)		Philip IV
1623	Urban VIII (Barberini)
1637		Ferdinand III

	POPES.	EMPERORS.	KINGS OF SPAIN.	KINGS OF FRANCE.
1643				Louis XIV
1644	Innocent X (Pamfili)
1655	Alexander VII (Chigi)
1658		Leopold I
1665			Charles II
1667	Clement IX (Rospigliosi)
1670	Clement X (Altieri)
1676	Innocent XI (Odescalchi)
1689	Alexander VIII (Ottoboni)
1691	Innocent XII (Pignatelli)
1700	Clement XI (Albani)		Philip V
1705		Joseph I
1711		Charles VI
1715				Louis XV
1720	Innocent XIII (Conti)
1724	Benedict XIII (Orsini)
1730	Clement XII (Corsini)
1740	Benedict XIV (Lambertini)
1742		Charles VII
1743		Francis I
1746			Ferdinand VI
1758	Clement XIII (Rezzonico)		Charles III
1759		Joseph II
1765	Clement XIV (Ganganelli)
1769				Louis XVI
1774	Pius VI (Diaschi)
1775			Charles IV
1788		Leopold II
1790		Francis II
1792				Napoleon Bonaparte
1799
1800	Pius VII (Chiaramonti)
1808			Ferdinand VII
1814				Louis XVIII
1823	Leo XII (della Genga)			Charles X
1824
1829	Pius VIII (Castiglioni)			Louis Philippe
1830
1831	Gregory XVI (Capellari)
1833			Isabella II
1846	Pius IX (Mastai-Ferretti)
1848				Louis Napoleon
1878	Leo XIII (Pecci)
1903	Pius X (Sarto)

BOOK I

INTRODUCTION

CHAPTER I

EPOCHS OF THE PAPACY

A.D. 1-1500

I. CHRISTIANITY IN THE ROMAN EMPIRE

IF we examine the condition of the ancient world in its earlier ages, we find it occupied by a great number of independent communities. Seated along the shores of the Mediterranean, and extending themselves inland, so far as their knowledge of the country permitted, they dwelt divided into various tribes, all originally confined within very narrow limits, but all purely free, and each possessing its own peculiar character and institutions. The independence enjoyed by these communities was not merely political; an independent religion also had been established by each: the ideas of God and of divine things had received a character strictly local; deities of the most diversified attributes divided the worship of the world, and the law by which their votaries were governed became inseparably united with that of the state. We may safely declare that this intimate union of church and state, this twofold freedom, limited only by the light obligations arising from identity of race, had the most important share in the civilisation of the early ages. Each community was indeed surrounded by narrow limits, but within these the rich fulness of the world's vigorous youth found space to develop itself according to its own unfettered impulse.

How entirely was all this changed as the might of Rome arose! All the self-governing powers that had previously filled the world are seen to bend one after the other, and finally to disappear. How suddenly did the earth become desolated of her free nations !

In later times, empires have been shaken because religion had lost its power of control. In those days the subjugation of the state necessarily involved the downfall of the national religion. Impelled by the political power, believers in every creed would draw towards Rome ; but what significance could remain to these peculiar forms of belief, once torn from the soil whence they had derived their birth ? The worship of Isis was doubtless intelligible in Egypt, where it deified the powers of nature, as manifested in those regions. In Rome, this worship became a senseless idolatry. No sooner did the various mythologies come in contact than their mutual destruction ensued : it was impossible to discover any theory capable of reconciling their contradictions.

But even had this been possible, it would no longer have sufficed to the necessities of the world.

However deeply we may sympathise with the fall of so many free states, we cannot fail to perceive that a new life sprang immediately from their ruins. With the overthrow of independence, fell the barriers of all exclusive nationalities : the nations were conquered—they were overwhelmed together ; but by that very act were they blended and united ; for, as the limits of the Empire were held to comprise the whole earth, so did its subjects learn to consider themselves as one people. From this moment the human family began to acquire the consciousness of its universal brotherhood.

It was at this period of the world's development that Jesus Christ was born.

How obscure and unpretending was his life ! His occupation was to heal the sick and to discourse of God in parables with a few fishermen, who did not always understand his words. He had not where to lay his head. Yet, even from the worldly point of view whence we consider it, we may safely assert that nothing more guileless or more impressive, more exalted or more holy, has ever been seen on earth than were his life, his whole conversation, and his death. In his every word there breathes the pure spirit of God. They are words, as St. Peter has expressed it, of eternal life.

The records of humanity present nothing that can be compared, however remotely, with the life of Jesus.

If the earlier forms of belief had ever contained an element of true religion, this was now entirely obscured; they no longer, as we have said, could pretend to the slightest significance. In Him who united the nature of man with that of God, there shone forth, in contrast with these shadows, the universal and eternal relation of God to the world, and of man to God.

Jesus Christ was born among a people broadly separated and distinguished from all others by ritual laws of rigid and exclusive severity, but which also possessed the inappreciable merit of holding steadfastly to that worship of the one true God in which they had persisted from their earliest existence, and from which no power could sever them. It is true that they considered this monotheism as a national worship only, but it was now to receive a much wider significance. Christ abolished the law by fulfilling it; the Son of Man declared himself Lord also of the Sabbath, and rendered manifest the eternal import of those forms, which a narrow understanding had as yet but imperfectly comprehended. Thus, from the bosom of a people hitherto separated by insurmountable barriers of opinion and customs from every other, there arose, with all the force of truth, a faith which invited and received all men. The Universal Father was now proclaimed,—that God who, as St. Paul declared to the Athenians, “hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth.” For this sublime doctrine, the moment, as we have seen, had now arrived—a race of men existed who could appreciate its value. “Like a sunbeam,” says Eusebius, “it streamed over the face of the earth.”¹ Its beneficent influence was quickly seen extending from the Euphrates to the Ebro, and overflowing the wide limits of the Empire even to the Rhine and the Danube.

But however pure and blameless the religion of Christ, it was not in the nature of things that it should escape opposition from the creeds already established. These had entwined themselves with the habits and wants of daily life; they were bound up with all the old memories of the world; and had, besides, now received a certain modification which had brought them into harmony with the constitution of the Empire.

¹ Hist. Eccl. ii. 3.

The political spirit of the ancient religions displayed itself once again under a new aspect. All those self-governing powers that had once filled the world had become absorbed into one concentrated whole. There remained but one sole power that could be called self-dependent; religion acknowledged this when she decreed divine worship to the emperor. To him temples were built and sacrifices offered, vows were made in his name, and festivals were solemnised in his honour, his statues gave the sacredness of a sanctuary to the place where they stood. The worship men paid to the genius of the emperor was perhaps the only one common to the whole Empire; ¹ all idolatries accommodated themselves to this, for to all it offered countenance and support.

This worship of the Caesar and the doctrines taught by Christ had a certain resemblance when viewed with relation to the various local religions, but they nevertheless presented the strongest possible contrast with each other.

The emperor conceived religion in its most worldly aspect only, as bound to earth and the things of earth. "To him be these surrendered," says Celsus; "whatever each man possesses, let it come from him." Christianity regarded religion in the fulness of the spirit and of superhuman truth.

The emperor united Church and State: Christianity separated, before all things, that which is Caesar's from that which belongs to God.

The offering of sacrifice to the emperor was an acknowledgment of the most abject thralldom. In that very union of church and state wherein consisted the perfection of independence under the self-governing powers, might now be found the seal and completion of man's subjection: thus the prohibition of this worship by Christianity was an act of emancipation. Finally, the adoration paid to the emperor was restricted by the limits of the Empire,—then believed to comprise the whole earth,—while the true faith was destined to reach to the world's real limits, and to embrace the whole human family. Christianity sought to re-awaken the primitive consciousness of religious truth (if it be granted that such consciousness preceded all idolatries), or, at least, to infuse a belief complete in its purity, obscured by no inevitable connection with the state, and opposed to the exactions of that all-grasping power which, not content with earthly dominion, was seeking to extend its influence over things divine also. It was from Christianity that man derived the spiritual element wherein he could once again become self-sustaining, free, and personally invincible; a new vitality awoke in the bosom of the freshened earth, she became fructified for the development of new productions.

¹ Eckkel, Doctrina Nummorum Veterum, pt. ii. vol. viii. p. 456; he quotes a passage from Tertullian, whence it would appear that the worship of the emperor was sometimes more earnest than any other.

At this moment was exhibited the contrast between the earthly and the spiritual, between freedom and servitude,—a gradual decay and a life-breathing and vigorous renovation.

It is not here that we can describe the long struggle between these opposing principles: all the elements of life throughout the Roman empire became involved in the movement,—all were gradually penetrated and influenced by the essential truth of Christianity, and were borne forward by this great effort of the spirit. “By its own act,” says Chrysostom, “has the error of idolatry been extinguished;”¹ already did Paganism appear to him as a conquered city, whose walls were beaten down, whose halls, theatres, and public buildings had been destroyed by fire, whose defenders had fallen by the sword, and among whose ruins remained only old men or helpless children. These, too, were soon dispersed, and a change without example ensued.

From the depths of the catacombs uprose the adoration of the martyrs. On those sites where the gods of Olympus had been worshipped, on the very columns that had supported their temples, were shrines erected to the memory of those who had rejected their divinity, and died for refusing to yield them worship. The religion of Christ, coming forth from the desert and the dungeon, took possession of the world. We sometimes feel astonished that precisely a secular building of the heathen, the basilica, should have been converted to the purposes of Christian worship: but in this fact, there is a remarkable significance,—the apsis of the basilica contained an Augusteum,¹ the assembled statues of such emperors as had received divine worship. These were replaced by the images of Christ and his apostles, as they are seen in many basilicas to the present day. The rulers of the world, themselves considered as deities, gave place to the Son of God arrayed in the nature of man. The local deities passed away, and were seen no more. In every highway, on the steep summits of the hills, in the deep ravines and remote valleys, on the roofs of houses, and in the mosaic of the floors was seen the cross: the victory was complete and decisive. As, on the coins of Constantine, the labarum, with the monogram of Christ, is seen to rise above the conquered dragon, so did the worship and name of Jesus exalt itself over the vanquished gods of heathenism.

¹ Λόγος εἰς τὸν μακάριον Βαβύλαν καὶ κατὰ Ἰουλιανοῦ καὶ πρὸς Ἕλληνας. Chrysostomi Opera, ed. Paris, ii. 540.

Considered in this aspect also, how all-embracing is the influence—how immense the importance of the Roman empire! In the ages of its elevation all nations were subjugated, all independence destroyed by its power; the feeling of self-reliance, resulting from the division of interests, was annihilated: but, on the other hand, its later years beheld the true religion awake in its bosom,—the purest expression of a common consciousness extending far beyond its limits,—the consciousness of a community in the one true God. May we not venture to say, that by this development the empire had fulfilled her destiny—that she had rendered her own existence no longer necessary? The human race had acquired the knowledge of its true nature; religion had revealed the common brotherhood of mankind.

This religion now received from the Roman empire its external forms also.

Among the heathens, sacerdotal offices were conferred in like manner with those of civil life: the Jews set apart a particular tribe for the duties of the priesthood; but

¹ I take this fact from E. Q. Visconti, Museo Pio-Clementino, vii. 100.

Christianity was distinguished from both these by the fact that a certain class of men, freely choosing the sacred profession, consecrated by the imposition of hands, and withdrawn from worldly cares and pursuits, is solemnly devoted "to things spiritual and divine." The Church was at first governed in accordance with republican forms ; but these disappeared as the new belief rose to pre-eminence, and the clergy gradually assumed a position entirely distinct from that of the laity.

This did not take place, as I think, without a certain innate necessity. The advance of Christianity involved an emancipation of religion from all political elements, and this was inevitably followed by the establishment of a distinct ecclesiastical body, with a constitution peculiar to itself. In this separation of the Church from the State consists, perhaps, the most important and most effectually influential peculiarity of Christian times. The spiritual and temporal powers may come into close contact—they may remain in the most intimate communion ; but a perfect coalition can only take place occasionally, and for short periods of time. In their reciprocal relations and position with regard to each other, has since then been involved one of the most important questions presented by all history.

It was nevertheless imperative on the ecclesiastical body to form their constitution on the model of that of the Empire ; and accordingly, the hierarchy of the bishops—metropolitan patriarchs—was formed in close correspondence with the gradations of the civil power. No long time had elapsed before the bishops of Rome acquired the supremacy. It is, indeed, a vain pretence to assert that this supremacy was universally acknowledged by east and west, even in the first century, or, indeed, at any time ; but it is equally certain that they quickly gained a pre-eminence, raising them far above all other ecclesiastical dignitaries. Many causes concurred to secure them this position ; for, if the relative importance of each provincial capital secured to its bishop a corresponding weight and dignity, how much more certainly would this result take place as regarded the ancient capital of the Empire—that city whence the whole had derived its name ?¹ Rome was, besides, one of the most illustrious seats of the apostles :

¹ Casauboni Exercitationes ad Annales Ecclesiasticos Baronii, p. 260.

here had the greater number of the martyrs shed their blood. The bishops of Rome had displayed the most undaunted firmness throughout the different persecutions, and had sometimes been scarcely installed into their sacred office before they followed their predecessor in the path of that martyrdom by which his seat had been vacated. In addition to all this, the emperors now found it advisable to favour the advancement of a great patriarchal authority. In a law that became decisive for the predominance of Rome as well as of Christianity, Theodosius the Great commands that all nations claiming the protection of his grace should receive the faith as propounded by St. Peter to the Romans.¹ Valentinian also forbade the bishops, whether of Gaul or of other provinces, to depart from the received customs of the Church without the sanction of that venerable man, the pope of the Holy City. Thenceforth the power of the Roman bishops advanced beneath the protection of the emperor himself; but in this political connection lay also a restrictive force: had there been but one emperor, a universal primacy might also have established itself; but this was prevented by the partition of the Empire. The emperors of the East were too eagerly tenacious of their ecclesiastical rights to make it possible that they should promote that extension of power desired by the western patriarchs in their dominions. In this respect also the constitution of the Church presents the closest resemblance to that of the Empire.

2. THE PAPACY IN CONNECTION WITH THE FRANKISH EMPIRE

Scarcely was this great change completed, the Christian religion established, and the Church founded, when new events of great importance took place; the Roman empire, so long conquering and paramount, was now to see itself assailed by its neighbours: in its turn it was invaded and overcome.

¹ Codex Theodos. xvi. 1, 2.—“Cunctos populos quos clementiae nostrae regit temperamentum, in tali volumus religione versari, quam divinum Petrum Apostolum tradidisse Romanis religio usque nunc ab ipso insinuata declarat.” Planck also mentions the edict of Valentinian III (Geschichte der christlich-kirchlichen Gesellschaftsverfassung, i. 642).

Amidst the general convulsion that ensued, Christianity itself received a violent shock. In their terror, the Romans bethought themselves once more of the Etruscan mysteries, the Athenians hoped to be saved by Achilles and Minerva, the Carthaginians offered prayers to the genius Coelestis; but these were only temporary waverings, for even whilst the Empire was shattered in the western provinces, the Church remained firm and undisturbed throughout all.

But she fell, as was inevitable, into many embarrassments, and found herself in an entirely altered condition. A pagan people took possession of Britain; Arian kings seized the greater part of the remaining West; while the Lombards, long attached to Arianism, and, as neighbours, most dangerous and hostile, established a powerful sovereignty before the very gates of Rome.

The Roman bishops meanwhile, beset on all sides, exerted themselves, with all the prudence and pertinacity which have remained their peculiar attributes, to regain the mastery, at least in their ancient patriarchal diocese; but a new and still heavier calamity now assailed them. The Arabs,—not conquerors merely, as were the Germans; but men inspired even to fanaticism by an arrogant and dogmatizing creed, in direct opposition to the Christian faith,—now poured themselves over the West as they had previously done over the East. After repeated attacks, they gained possession of Africa: one battle made them masters of Spain; their general, Musa, boasting that he would march into Italy by the passes of the Pyrenees and across the Alps, and cause the name of Mahomet to be proclaimed from the Vatican.

This position was all the more perilous for the western portion of Roman Christendom, from the fact that the iconoclastic dissensions were at that moment raging with the most deadly animosity on both sides. The emperor of Constantinople had adopted the opposite party to that favoured by the pope of Rome; nay, the life of the latter was more than once in danger from the emperor's machinations.

The Lombards did not fail to perceive the advantages derivable to themselves from these dissensions; their king, Astolphus, took possession of provinces that till then had always acknowledged the dominion of the emperor, and again advancing towards Rome, he summoned that city also to surrender, demanding payment of tribute with vehement threats.¹

The Roman see was at this moment in no condition to help itself, even against the Lombards; still less could it hope to contend with the Arabs, who were beginning to extend their sovereignty over the Mediterranean, and were threatening all Christendom with a war of extermination.

Happily, the true faith was no longer confined within the limits of the Roman empire.

Christianity, in accordance with its original destiny, had long overpassed these limits—more especially had it taken deep root among the German tribes of the West; nay, a Christian power had already arisen among these tribes, and towards this the pope had but to stretch forth his hands, when he was sure to find the most effectual succour and earnest allies against all his enemies.

Among all the Germanic nations, the Franks alone had become Catholic from their first rise in the provinces of the Roman empire. This acknowledgment of the Roman see had secured important advantages to the Frankish nation. In the Catholic subjects of their Arian enemies, the western Goths and Burgundians, the Franks found natural allies. We read so much of the miracles by which Clovis was favoured; how St. Martin showed him the ford over the Vienne by means of a hind; how St. Hilary preceded his armies in a column of fire; that we shall not greatly err if we conclude these legends to shadow forth the material succours afforded by the natives to those who shared their creed, and for whom, according to Gregory of Tours, they desired victory “with eager inclination.” But this attachment to Catholicism, thus confirmed from the beginning by consequences so important, was afterwards renewed and powerfully strengthened by a very peculiar influence arising from a totally different quarter.

¹ Anastasius Bibliothecarius: Vitae Pontificum. Vita Stephani III., ed. Paris, p. 83.—“Fremens ut leo pestiferas minas Romanis dirigere non desinebat, asserens omnes uno gladio jugulari, nisi suae sese subderent ditioni.”

It chanced that certain Anglo-Saxons, being exposed for sale in the slave-market of Rome, attracted the attention of Pope Gregory the Great ; he at once resolved that Christianity should be preached to the nation whence these beautiful captives had been taken. Never, perhaps, was resolution adopted by any pope whence results more important ensued : together with the doctrines of Christianity, a veneration for Rome and for the Holy See, such as had never before existed in any nation, found place among the Germanic Britons. The Anglo-Saxons began to make pilgrimages to Rome, they sent their youth thither to be educated, and King Offa established the tax called "Peter's Pence" for the relief of pilgrims and the education of the clergy. The higher orders proceeded to Rome, in the hope that, dying there, a more ready acceptance would be accorded to them by the saints in heaven. The Anglo-Saxons appear to have transferred to Rome and the Christian saints the old Teutonic superstition, by which the gods were described as nearer to some spots of earth than to others, and more readily to be propitiated in places thus favoured.

But beside all this, results of higher importance still ensued when the Anglo-Saxons transplanted their modes of thought to the mainland, and imbued the whole empire of the Franks with their own opinions. Boniface, the apostle of the Germans, was an Anglo-Saxon ; this missionary, largely sharing in the veneration professed by his nation for St. Peter and his successors, had from the beginning voluntarily pledged himself to abide faithfully by all the regulations of the Roman see : to this promise he most religiously adhered. On all the German churches founded by him was imposed an extraordinary obligation to obedience. Every bishop was required expressly to promise that his whole life should be passed in unlimited obedience to the Romish church, to St. Peter and his representative. Nor did he confine this rule to the Germans only. The Gallican bishops had hitherto maintained a certain independence of Rome ; Boniface, who had more than once presided in their synods, availed himself of these occasions to impress his own views on this western portion of the Frankish church; thenceforward the Gallic archbishops received their pallium from Rome, and thus did the devoted submission of the Anglo-Saxons extend itself over the whole realm of the Franks.

This Empire had now become the central point for all the German tribes of the West. The fact that the reigning family, the Merovingian race, had brought about its own destruction by its murderous atrocities, had not affected the strength of the Empire. Another family, that of Pepin of Heristal, had risen to supreme power,—men of great energy, exalted force of character and indomitable vigour. While other realms were sinking together into one common ruin, and the world seemed about to become the prey of the Moslem, it was this race, the house of Pepin of Heristal, afterwards called the Carlovingian, by which the first and decisive resistance was offered to the Mahometan conquerors.

The religious development then in progress was also equally favoured by the house of Pepin: we find it early maintaining the best understanding with Rome, and it was under the special protection of Charles Martel and Pepin le Bref that Boniface proceeded in his apostolic labours.¹ Let us consider the temporal condition of the papal power. On the one side the East Roman empire, weakened, falling into ruin, incapable of supporting Christendom against Islamism, or of defending its own domains in Italy against the Lombards, yet continuing to claim supremacy even in spiritual affairs. On the other hand, we have the German nations full of the most vigorous life; victorious over the Moslem, attached with all the fresh ardour and trusting enthusiasm of youth to that authority, of whose protecting and restrictive influences they still felt the need, and filled with an unlimited and most freely rendered devotion.

Already Gregory the Second perceived the advantages

¹ Bonifacii Epistolae, ep. 12, ad Danielelem episc.—“Sine patrocinio principis Francorum nec populum regere, nec presbyteros vel diaconos, monachos vel ancillas Dei, defendere possum; nec ipsos paganorum ritus et sacrilegia idolorum in Germania sine illius mandato et timore prohibere valeo.”

he had gained; full of a proud self-consciousness, he writes thus to that iconoclast emperor, Leo the Isaurian:—"All the lands of the West have their eyes directed towards our humility; by them are we considered as a God upon earth." His successors became ever more and more impressed with the conviction that it was needful to separate themselves from a power (that of the Roman empire) by which many duties were imposed on them, but which could offer them no protection in return. They could not safely permit a succession to the mere name and empire to fetter them, but turned themselves rather towards those from whom help and aid might also be expected. Thus they entered into strict alliance with those great captains of the West, the Frankish monarchs; this became closer and closer from year to year, procured important advantages to both parties, and eventually exercised the most active influence on the destinies of the world.

When Pepin the younger, not content with the reality of kingly power, desired also to possess himself of the name, he felt that a higher sanction was needful. This the pope afforded him. In return, the new monarch undertook to defend "the Holy Church and the Republic of God" against the Lombards. Nor did he content himself with merely defending them. On the contrary; he compelled the Lombards to evacuate that portion of territory called the Exarchate, which they had wrenched from the Roman empire. In strict justice this should have been restored to the emperor from whom it had been taken; but when the proposal for such restoration was made to Pepin, his reply was, "That for no favour of man had he entered the strife, but from veneration to St. Peter alone, and in the hope of obtaining forgiveness for his sins."¹ He caused the keys of the conquered towns to be placed on the altar of St. Peter, and in this act he laid the foundation of the whole temporal power of the popes.

In this reciprocity of services, the alliance between the pope and the emperor continued to extend and strengthen its bonds. At length the Holy See was delivered from its long oppressive and dangerous neighbours, the Lombard chiefs, by the emperor Charlemagne. In his own person this monarch evinced the most profound deference for the holy father: visiting Rome, he kissed the steps of St. Peter, as he entered the vestibule where the pontiff awaited him; here he confirmed all the possessions awarded by Pepin to the Church. The pope on his part always proved himself to be Charlemagne's most steady friend, and the influence of the spiritual chief with the Italian bishops rendered it an easy matter for the emperor to make himself master of the Lombards and gain possession of their dominions.

¹ Anastasius: "Affirmans etiam sub juramento, quod per nullius hominis favorem sese certamini saepius dedisset, nisi pro amore Petri et venia delictorum,"

This tendency of events was soon to be followed by results of still higher importance.

The strife of contending factions was now raging so violently in Rome, that the pope could no longer maintain himself in his own city without foreign aid. In this conjuncture Charlemagne once more visited Rome to afford the assistance needed. The aged monarch was now full of fame and victory; after long struggles he had gradually subdued all his neighbours, and had united under his own banner the greater part of the Romano-Germanic nations of Christendom. These he had repeatedly led to victory against their common enemy, and it was matter of remark that he possessed all the seats of the western emperors, whether in Italy, Germany, or Gaul;¹ and had, besides, inherited all their power. It is true that these countries had since become a totally different world, but should this diminish the dignity of their leader? It was thus that Pepin had gained the Royal diadem, for to him who has secured the power does the dignity also belong. It was in this sense that the pope again decided; impelled by gratitude, and well knowing his own need of a permanent protector, he placed the crown of the western empire on Charlemagne's head on Christmas-eve of the year 800.

¹ Thus it is that I understand the Annales Laureshamenses, ad annum 801: "Visum est et ipsi apostolico Leoni, . . . ut ipsum Carolum regem Francorum imperatorem nominare debuissent, qui ipsam Romam tenebat, ubi semper Caesares sedere soliti erant, et reliquas sedes quas ipse per Italiam seu Galliam nec non et Germaniam tenebat (he doubtless meant to say ipsi tenebant); quia Deus omnipotens has omnes sedes in potestatem ejus concessit, ideo justum eis esse videbatur, ut ipse cum Dei adjutorio ipsum nomen haberet."

With this act, the series of events which had commenced with the first incursions of the German tribes into the Roman empire was fully completed.

A Frankish sovereign now filled the place of the western emperors, and exercised all their prerogatives. In the dominions conferred on St. Peter, we see Charlemagne performing unequivocal acts of sovereign authority. His grandson Lothaire nominated his own judges in Rome, and annulled confiscations made by the pope. The pontiff, on the other hand, remaining head of the hierarchy in the Roman West, became, nevertheless, a member of the Frankish empire. He separated himself from the East, and gradually ceased to command any influence there. Of his patriarchal diocese in the East the Greek emperors had long since bereft him.¹ But he received a degree of observance from the western churches (not excepting the Lombard, which had also been subjected to the Frankish laws and institutions) exceeding all that he had previously enjoyed. Permitting the introduction of schools for Frieslanders, Saxons, and Franks, into Rome, by which that city itself began to be Germanised, he thus induced that intimate connection of German and Latin elements which has since so actively influenced the general character of the West. In his utmost adversity the power of the pope struck new roots in a fresh soil; threatened by the most imminent ruin, it was at this moment that a firm and lengthened endurance was secured to it: the hierarchy, taking its rise in the Roman empire, now diffused itself over the German nations; these presented a boundless field for ever extending activity, and here it was that the germ of its being was first fully developed.

¹ Nicholas I laments the loss of the patriarchal power of the Roman see—"per Epirum veterem Epirumque novam atque Illyricum, Macedoniam, Thessaliam, Achaiam, Daciam ripensem Daciamque mediterraneam, Moesiam, Dardanium, Praevalim"; also the loss of the patrimony in Calabria and Sicily. Pagi (Critica in Annales Baronii, iii. p. 216) compares this letter with one from Adrian I to Charlemagne, whence it is obvious that these losses were among the results of the iconoclastic disputes.

3. RELATION OF THE POPES TO THE GERMAN EMPERORS.—INTERNAL PROGRESS OF THE HIERARCHY

We now pass over some centuries, in order that we may bring before ourselves more clearly the point of development to which they led.

The Empire of the Franks has fallen ; that of the Germans has arisen into full and vigorous life.

Never was the German name more powerful in Europe than during the tenth and eleventh centuries, under the Saxon and first Salique emperors. We see Conrad II marching from the eastern frontier, where he had compelled the king of Poland to personal subjection, and to a division of his territory, and condemned the duke of Bohemia to imprisonment, and pouring down on the West to support Burgundy against the pretensions of the French nobles. These nobles he defeated on the plains of Champagne, his Italian vassals crossing the St. Bernard to his assistance. He caused himself to be crowned at Geneva, and held his diet at Solothurn. Immediately after this, we find him in Lower Italy. "By the force of his word," says his historian, Wippo, "he extinguished all discords on the borders of his empire at Capua and Beneventum." Nor was Henry III less powerful : at one moment we find him on the Scheldt and the Lys, victorious over the counts of Flanders ; no long time has elapsed, and we meet him in Hungary, which country he also compelled, at least for some time, to do him feudal service. He pressed beyond the Raab, where his conquests were limited by the power of the elements alone. The king of Denmark hastened to await his arrival at Merseburg : the count of Tours, one of the most powerful princes of France, submitted to become his vassal ; and the Spanish historians inform us, that he demanded from the mighty and victorious Ferdinand I of Castile an acknowledgment of his own supremacy as sovereign liege of all Christian kings,

If we now ask on what basis a power so extended in its influence, and claiming supremacy throughout Europe, essentially reposed, we find in it a most active and important ecclesiastical element. The Germans also made their conquests and conversions go hand in hand with the church, their marches, too, extend over the Elbe towards the Oder on the one hand, and the Danube on the other. Monks and priests prepared the way for German influence in Bohemia and Hungary: thus did a great increase of importance everywhere accrue to the ecclesiastical power. Baronial and even ducal rights were held in Germany by the bishops and abbots of the Empire, not within their own possessions only, but even beyond them. Ecclesiastical estates were no longer described as situated in certain counties, but these counties were described as situated in the bishoprics. In Upper Italy nearly all the cities were governed by the viscounts of their bishops. We are not authorised to infer from this, that an entire independence was already conceded to the clerical body. The appointment to all ecclesiastical offices still resting with the sovereign (the chapters returned the ring and crosier of their deceased superior to his court, whence it was that they were conferred anew), it was generally advantageous to the prince that the man of his choice, one on whose devotion to himself he could rely, should be invested with temporal authority. It was in defiance of his refractory nobles that Henry III exalted a plebeian, on whom he could depend, to the seat of St. Ambrose in Milan: to this mode of action he was principally indebted for the obedience he subsequently met with in Upper Italy. No emperor displayed greater munificence towards the Church than did Henry II; yet none was more tenacious of his claim to the nomination of bishops:¹ but these two facts are illustrative of each other. Nor was the endowment of bishops permitted to diminish the resources of the state. Church property was neither exempted from civil imposts nor from feudal service, and bishops were frequently found taking the field at the head of their vassals. How advantageous to the prince, therefore, was the right of nominating bishops, who, like the archbishop of Bremen, held the highest ecclesiastical authority in the kingdoms of Scandinavia, and over numerous Wendish tribes!

¹ For instances of this, see Planck's Geschichte der christlich-kirchlichen Gesellschaftsverfassung, iii. 407.

If, then, the ecclesiastical element was of such paramount importance to the institutions of the German empire, it is manifest that much would depend on the relations existing between the emperor and the head of the whole clerical body, the pope of Rome.

The papacy was not less closely allied with the German emperors than it had been with the Roman, and with the successors of Charlemagne. The political subordination of the pope was unquestionable. It is true, that while the Empire remained in weak and incapable hands, and before it passed definitely to the Germans, certain acts of sovereign authority had been exercised by popes over the imperial sceptre; but no sooner did the vigorous German princes attain to that dignity, than they became, if not without dispute, yet in fact, as completely liege lords of the popedom as the Carlovingian monarchs had been. With a powerful hand Otho the Great maintained the pope whom he had raised to the throne:¹ his sons followed the example. The circumstance of the Roman factions once more rising into activity, seizing the papal chair, and again resigning it, or making it an article of traffic and barter, as their family interests required, shews but more clearly the necessity for some higher intervention. The vigour with which this was exercised by Henry III is well known; his synod at Sutri deposed such popes as he considered irregularly chosen; and scarcely had the patrician ring been placed on his finger, and the crown of the Empire on his brow, than he nominated the individual who should ascend the papal throne by his unrestricted will. Four German popes were successively appointed by him; and when the supreme ecclesiastical dignity became vacant, the ambassadors from Rome presented themselves at the imperial court to receive the announcement of a successor, as did the envoys of other bishoprics.

¹ In Goldast: Constitut. Imperiales, i. p. 221, we find an instrument (with the Scholia of Dietrich von Niem) by which the right of Charlemagne to choose his own successor, and in future that of the popes, is transferred to Otho and the German emperors. This, however, is without doubt a fabrication.

In this position of things, it was a matter of personal interest to the emperor that the pope should hold an important place in the eyes of the world. Henry III was an active promoter of all reforms undertaken by the popes whom he had nominated; nor did the growth of their power awaken his jealousy. That Leo IX should hold a synod at Rheims, in despite of the king of France—should exalt and depose French bishops, receiving the solemn acknowledgment that the pope was sole primate of the universal Church—this could in no way offend the emperor, while his own supremacy over the papacy remained undisputed; it gave, on the contrary, a more imposing weight to the authority he claimed to exercise over all Europe. As he was placed by the archbishop of Bremen in immediate relation with the north, so was he placed by the pope with the remaining powers of Christendom.

But this state of affairs involved a great danger to the Empire. The ecclesiastical body was very differently constituted under the Germanic and Germanised states, from what it had been under the Roman empire. The clergy now possessed a large share of political influence; they had risen to princely power. The Church still depended on the emperor, the supreme temporal authority. But suppose this authority again fallen into weak and incapable hands; suppose, then, that the head of the Church, wielding the triple force arising from his dignity,—the object of universal reverence,—from the devotion of his own subjects, and from his influence over other states, should seize the favourable moment and place himself in opposition to the imperial power.

The nature of things offered more than one inducement to such a course. There was a principle inherent in the ecclesiastical constitution which opposed itself to a secular influence so widely extended, and this would inevitably make itself felt, should the Church become strong enough to bring it into effectual action. There is also, as it appears to me, an inconsistency in the fact that the pope should exercise on all sides the supreme spiritual power, and yet remain himself subjected to the emperor. The case would have been different had Henry III really brought about his purpose of exalting himself to be the head of all Christendom ; but as he failed in this, there needed but a certain complication of political affairs, and the pope might have been prevented, by his subordination to the emperor, from performing the duties imposed on him by his office as common father of the faithful.

It was under these circumstances that Gregory VII ascended the papal throne. Gregory was a man of bold, prejudiced, and aspiring mind, obstinate in his adherence to logical consequences, immovable in his purposes, yet skilful and pliant when the object was to parry any well-founded objection. He perceived the end to which things were tending, and amidst the trifling occurrences of every-day life, took note of the vast contingencies preparing for the future. He resolved to free the pontificate from the authority of the Empire. Having fixed his thoughts on this object, he soon seized the decisive means for attaining it. The resolution that he caused to be adopted by one of his councils, namely that no clerical office should in future be conferred by a layman, was equivalent to altering the constitution of the Empire in its very essence. This reposed, as we have already said, on the connection between the spiritual and temporal institutions : the bond that held these together was the investiture ; to deprive the emperor of this his ancient right, was to declare a revolution.

It is obvious that Gregory could not have ventured to think of this measure, much less to put it in practice, had he not been favoured by the convulsions that shook the Empire during the minority of Henry IV, and by the frequent insurrections of the German princes and people against that monarch. Among the great vassals he found natural allies. They also felt oppressed by the overwhelming power of the emperor ; they also desired to become free. In a certain point of view, the pope might be considered one of the magnates of the Empire. It is not then surprising, that, when the pontiff declared Germany an electoral monarchy,—a doctrine tending greatly to augment the power of the princes,—these last should offer no opposition to the efforts he made for his own emancipation from the imperial power.

Even in the contention for the investiture, their interests went hand in hand : the pope was still far from claiming the direct nomination of the bishops ; he referred the choice to the chapters, and over these the higher German nobility exercised the most commanding influence : in one word, the pope had the aristocratic interests on his side.

But even with these allies, how long and sanguinary were the conflicts maintained by the popes before they could bring their enterprise to a fortunate issue ! " From Denmark even to Apulia," says the hymn in praise of St. Anno—" from Carlingen to Hungary, have the arms of the Empire been turned against its own vitals." The contention between the spiritual and temporal principles, which had hitherto acted in concert, spread fatal discord through the breadth of Europe. Frequently were the pontiffs driven from their capital, and compelled to witness the ascent of antipopes to the apostolic throne !

At length, however, the task was accomplished. After long centuries of confusion—after other centuries of often doubtful strife, the independence of the Roman see and that of its essential principle was finally attained. In effect, the position of the popes was at this moment most exalted ; the clergy were wholly in their hands. It is worthy of remark that the most firm-minded pontiffs of this period—Gregory VII, for example—were Benedictines. By the introduction of celibacy they converted the whole body of the secular clergy into a kind of monastic order. The universal bishopric now claimed by the popes bears a certain resemblance to the power of an abbot of Cluny, who was the only abbot of his order ; in like manner these pontiffs aspired to be the only bishops of the assembled church. They interfered without scruple in the administration of every diocese,¹ and even compared their legates with the proconsuls of ancient Rome! While this closely-knit body, so compact in itself, yet so widely extended through all lands,—influencing all by its large possessions, and controlling every relation of life by its ministry,—was concentrating its mighty force under the obedience of one chief, the temporal powers were crumbling into ruin. Already in the beginning of the twelfth century the provost Gerohus ventured to say: “It will at last come to this, that the golden image of the Empire shall be shaken to dust—every great monarchy shall be divided into tetrarchates, and then only will the Church stand free and untrammelled beneath the protection of her crowned high-priest.”¹ And this bold prophecy had well-nigh received a literal fulfilment; for which was in fact the more powerful in England during the thirteenth century—was it Henry III or those four and twenty to whom the government was for a certain period confided? In Castile, who were the effective rulers—the king or the altos homes? The power of the emperor seems to have become superfluous from the moment when Frederick conceded the essential attributes of sovereignty to the princes of the empire. Italy, as well as Germany, was occupied by numerous independent powers; the only self-centred and comprehensive sovereignty was that of the pope. Thus it came to pass that the independence of the ecclesiastical principle resolved itself into a new kind of monarchy; the politico-religious character that life had everywhere assumed, and the general course of circumstances, all tended to this result. When countries, long lost to the Church, as Spain had been, were regained from Mahometanism—when provinces, like Prussia, hitherto buried in the darkness of paganism, were brought over to the faith and filled with a Christian population—when even the capitals of the Greek church conformed to the Latin ritual, and when hundreds of thousands poured forth to plant the banner of the Cross on the Holy Sepulchre—is it not manifest, that the crowned priest, whose hand was in all these enterprises, and at whose feet was offered the fealty of the subdued, must have enjoyed unbounded influence and honour? In his name, and under his guidance, the western nations poured themselves forth as one people and sought to gain possession of the whole world. It cannot awaken surprise that the pope should exercise unlimited authority in his internal administration, when we remember that a king of England consented to hold his kingdom as a fief from the pontiff's hand, that a king of Aragon resigned his realms to the apostle Peter, and that Naples beheld her throne conferred by the same all-commanding power on a family wholly foreign to her soil. Extraordinary aspect of those times—which yet no one has hitherto placed before us in all its completeness and truth! The most wonderful combination of internal discord with the most brilliant external progress of independence and subjection, of spiritual and temporal existences! Even piety herself adopted a twofold character. At one time we see her withdrawn amidst rugged mountains, or retiring to the lonely forest, where her harmless days are devoted to divine contemplation. Awaiting death, she denies herself every enjoyment that life presents her; or, appearing in the homes of man, she proceeds with youthful enthusiasm to exhibit, under forms profoundly suggestive, the mysteries that float around her, and the ideas in which she has her being. But a moment after and we find another piety—she who has invented the inquisition, and who fulminates the terrible judgment of the glaive against all who reject her creed. “Neither sex, nor age, nor rank, have we spared,” says the leader of the war against the Albigenes; “we have put all alike to the sword.” Sometimes she presents these widely differing aspects at the same moment of time. At sight of Jerusalem the crusaders descend from their horses—they bare their feet, to the end that they may approach the holy walls in the guise befitting pilgrims. In the midst of carnage they believe themselves aided by the visible presence of saints and angels. Yet, scarcely have they passed the walls, than they rush into the wildest excesses of pillage and bloodshed. On the site of Solomon's temple thousands of Saracens were cruelly put to death, the Jews were burnt in their synagogues, and the holy threshold, on which they had come so far to kneel in adoration, they first profaned with blood. In this contradiction may be found a picture eloquently illustrative of those times, and of that politico-religious government. It is an inconsistency that will be seen to pervade their whole being.

¹ One of the principal points, in reference to which may be cited the following passage from a letter of Henry IV to Gregory VII—" Rectores sanctae ecclesiae, videl. archiepiscopos, presbyteros, sicut servos pedibus tuis calcasti." But we perceive that in this case public opinion was on the side of the pope, since Henry thus continues his reproaches : " In quorum conculcatione tibi favorem ab ore vulgi comparasti."

¹ Schröckh quotes this passage, Kirchengeschichte, vol. xxvii p. 115.

4. CONTRASTS BETWEEN THE FOURTEENTH AND FIFTEENTH CENTURIES

There are certain periods of history that tempt us to scrutinize anxiously, if we dare thus to express ourselves, the plans of God in his government of the world, and earnestly to examine the forces that are in action for the education of the human race.

However defective may have been the development that we have sought to describe, it was indispensable to the complete naturalisation of Christianity in the West. The task of bending the refractory spirits of the northern tribes to the pure laws of Christian truth was no light one: wedded, as these nations were, to their long-cherished superstitions, the religious element required a long predominance before it could gain entire possession of the German character; but by this predominance, that close union of Latin and German elements was effected on which is based the character of Europe in later times. There is a spirit of community in the modern world which has always been regarded as the basis of its progressive improvement, whether in religion, politics, manners, social life, or literature. To bring about this community, it was necessary that the western nations should, at one period, constitute what may be called a single politico-ecclesiastical state.

But this, also, was to be no more than the phenomenon of a moment in the grand march of events; the necessary conversion once effected, new necessities supervened.

The advent of another epoch already announced itself in the simultaneous and almost universal impulse received by the languages of nations. Slowly, but with unceasing effort, they pressed themselves into the manifold branches of intellectual activity. Step by step the idiom of the Church gave way before them; universality retired, and in its place appeared a new species of partition, founded on a higher principle. The ecclesiastical element had up to this time overborne every distinguishing nationality; now, modified and transformed, but again asserting individual existence, these nationalities displayed themselves in a new light.

We are forced irresistibly to the conviction that all the purposes and efforts of humanity are subjected to the silent and often imperceptible, but invincible and ceaseless march of events. The existence of the papal authority was demanded by the earlier phases of the world's progress; those immediately following were directly adverse to that authority. The impulse given by the ecclesiastical power was no longer necessary to the well-being of nations; it was consequently at once opposed. All had awakened to a sense of their own independence.

We shall do well if we recall to mind the more important events in which this fact becomes revealed.

It was the French, as is well known, by whom the first effectual resistance was opposed to the pretensions of the popes. The whole nation declared itself as one man against the excommunications of Boniface VIII. All the public authorities expressed their adhesion to Philip the Fair, and their cordial approbation of the steps taken by him in his contest with the pontiff, in documents amounting to several hundreds.

Next followed the Germans. When the popes once more assailed the Empire with all their old animosity, although the latter no more possessed its ancient importance, yet, perceiving the dangers of foreign influence, the electoral princes assembled on the banks of the Rhine; seated on their stone chairs, in the field of Rense, they proceeded to adopt measures for maintaining "the honour and dignity of the Empire." Their object was to secure its independence against the future aggressions of the papacy by a solemn resolution. This was instantly afterwards promulgated with all due form, and by all the potentates united. Emperors, princes, and electors, all joined in a common opposition to the principles of the papal policy.¹

¹ Licet juris utriusque. See Ohlenschlager, Staatsgeschichte des röm. Kaiserthums in der ersten Hälfte des 14ten Jahrhunderts, No. 63.

England did not long remain behind. In no country had the popes possessed higher influence—nowhere had they dealt in a more arbitrary manner with the benefices of the Church; but when Edward III refused to continue the tribute, to the payment of which former kings had pledged themselves, his parliament united with him, and promised him their support. The king then took measures to prevent any further encroachments by the pope.

We thus see one nation after another acquiring the sense of its own unity and independence. The civil power would no longer endure the presence of any higher authority. The popes no more found allies among the middle classes, while princes and legislative bodies were resolutely bent on withstanding their influence.

In addition to all this, the papacy itself had at this period fallen into a state of debility and confusion, by which the secular princes, who had hitherto sought only to defend themselves, were enabled to become in their turn aggressors.

Schism made its appearance. Let us observe the consequences that ensued. It was long at the option of each prince to attach himself to one pope or the other, as might best suit his political interests. The Church possessed no means within herself by which this division could be remedied; by the secular power alone could this be done. When a council was held in Constance for that purpose, the members no longer voted individually, as had formerly been the practice, but by the four nations, each nation exercising the right of deliberating in preliminary assemblies on the vote to be given. Unanimously they decided the deposition of a pope, and the newly elected pontiff was called on to accede to concordats with each separate nation. These concordats were of great importance, only from the precedent they afforded. During the council of Basle, many states remained neutral; it was by the immediate intervention of the princes alone, that this second breach in the Church could be closed.¹ There could arise no state of things better calculated to promote the preponderance of the temporal power and the independence of the several states.

¹ Declaration of Pope Felix in Georgius, Vita Nicolai V, p. 65.

And now the pope was again in a position of great splendour. He was obeyed universally; the emperor still led his palfrey on occasions of ceremony. There were bishops—not in Hungary only, but in Germany also, who styled themselves bishops “by the grace of the Apostolic See.”¹ Peter’s pence were still collected in the north; innumerable pilgrims from all countries came flocking to the “threshold of the apostles”—an eye-witness compares them to swarms of bees, or flights of migratory birds; but, in spite of these appearances, the old relations of things were no longer in force.

If we desire proof of this, we need only recall the enthusiasm with which all ranks rushed towards the Holy Sepulchre in earlier times, and compare this with the coldness evinced in the fifteenth century towards every appeal in favour of a combined resistance to the Turks. How much more pressing was the necessity of protecting the native territory against the danger that unquestionably threatened it at all times, than that of maintaining the custody of the Holy Sepulchre in the hands of believers. Aeneas Sylvius and the Minorite Capistrano employed their best eloquence—the first in the diet, the second before the people in the market-places of towns; and historians tell us many things of the impression they produced, but we do not find that any one was moved to the taking up of arms. What efforts were made by the popes in this cause! One fitted out a fleet; another, Pius the Second, who was that same Aeneas Sylvius just alluded to, betook himself, though weak and suffering from illness, to the port where those princes whose domains were most immediately endangered, if none others, were expected to assemble. He desired to be present, in order, as he said, to lift up, like Moses, his hands to God during the battle, as he alone was empowered to do. Neither exhortations, nor entreaties, nor example could avail to move the people of his times. The youthful enthusiasm of chivalrous Christendom had passed away; no pope might ever awaken it more.

Other interests occupied the world. It was now the moment when the European kingdoms were finally consolidating their forces after long internal struggles. The central authorities, having succeeded in suppressing the factions that had endangered the security of the throne, were gathering their subjects around them in renewed allegiance. The papacy, interfering in all things and seeking to dominate all, came very soon to be regarded in a political point of view ; the temporal princes now began to put forth higher claims than they had hitherto done.

¹ Costnitz, Schwerin, Funfkirchen.—Schröckh, Kirchengeschichte, vol. xxxiii. p. 60.

It is commonly believed that the papal authority was almost unrestricted up to the time of the Reformation ; but the truth is that no inconsiderable portion of the rights and privileges of the clergy had been appropriated by the civil power, during the fifteenth and in the early part of the sixteenth centuries.

The encroachments of the Roman see were materially restricted in France by the pragmatic sanction, which for more than half a century was regarded as the palladium of the kingdom. It is true that Louis XI was hurried into certain concessions by that false devotion, to the forms of which he adhered the more rigidly, because altogether destitute of true religious feeling ; but his successors insisted all the more pertinaciously on a return to this their fundamental law. It has indeed been asserted that when Francis I concluded his concordat with Leo X, the Roman court thereby recovered its ancient preponderance, and it is very true that the pope did regain the first-fruits (Annates) ; but he was compelled to sacrifice valuable sources of revenue in exchange, and above all the right of nomination to the bishoprics and other important benefices. The rights of the Gallican church were unquestionably lost, but this was rather in favour of the king than the pope : the principle, for which Gregory VII had moved the whole world, was resigned with little difficulty by Leo X.

Matters were by no means carried so far in Germany : the decrees of Basle, which in France had received the form of a pragmatic sanction,¹ were rendered much less effectual in Germany, where also they had at first been accepted, by the concordat of Vienna; but this change was not effected without large concessions on the part of Rome.

¹ We perceive the connection from the following words of Aeneas Sylvius : " Propter decreta Basiliensis concilii inter sedem apostolicam et nationem vestram dissidium coepit, cum vos illa prorsus tenenda

In Germany it was not enough to come to terms with the high chief of the Empire; the subordinate states must also be separately won. The archbishops of Mainz and Trier obtained the privilege of naming to the vacant bishoprics, even during those months hitherto reserved for the pope; the electoral prince of Brandenburg extorted the right of nomination to the three bishoprics of his dominions, while less important states, as Strassburg, Salzburg, and Metz, were also propitiated by concessions.¹ But not even by these was the general opposition extinguished. In the year 1487, the whole Empire opposed itself to a tithe that the pope desired to impose and effectually defeated his purpose.² In 1500, the imperial government accorded one-third only of the sum produced by indulgences to the papal legates, appropriating the remaining two-thirds, and applying them in aid of the war against the Turks.

In England, without any new concordat, without any pragmatic sanction, affairs were carried far beyond the concessions of Constance. Henry VII possessed the undisputed right of nomination to the bishoprics, and, not content with retaining the promotion of the clergy in his own hands, he appropriated the half of the first-fruits also. The ecclesiastical and secular powers were, to a certain extent, united in the person of Wolsey, when, in the early part of Henry VIII's reign, he added the title of legate to his many other offices, and before Protestantism had been even thought of by the English sovereign, he had already proceeded to a merciless confiscation of numerous monasteries.

Nor did the countries and kingdoms of southern Europe remain in the background. By the king of Spain also, the diceretis, apostolica vero sedes omnia rejiceret. Itaque fuit denique compositio facta—per quam aliqua ex decretis concilii praedicti recepta videntur, aliqua rejecta.”—Aen. Sylvii Epistola ad Martinum Maicrum contra murmur gravaminis Germanicae nationis, 1457. Müller's Reichstagstheatrum unter Friedrich III, Vorst. iii. p. 604.

¹ Schröckh's Kirchengeschichte, vol. xxxii. p. 173. Eichhorn's Staats-und Rechtsgeschichte, vol. iii. § 472, n. c.

² Müller's Reichstagstheatrum, Vorst. vi. p. 130.

nomination to episcopal sees was assumed as of right; that crown, with which were united the grand masterships of the religious orders, which had instituted and still directed the Inquisition, made no scruple of appropriating various attributes and immunities, formerly held sacred to the clergy; nor did Ferdinand the Catholic shrink from opposing himself to the papal legates whenever it suited his purpose to do so.

In like manner with the religious orders of Spain, those of Portugal,—namely, St. James, Avis, and the order of Christ, which had inherited the wealth of the Templars, were also in the patronage of the crown.¹ King Emanuel obtained a third of the cruciata from Leo X, and not content with this, he demanded and received a tenth part of the church property in his dominions, with the express right of distributing it according to his unrestricted will, and the merit of the recipient.

These things sufficiently shew that a universal tendency to the circumscription of papal power was at this time manifested throughout Christendom, in the south as in the north. A participation in ecclesiastical revenues, and the right of promotion to church benefices and offices, was that which the civil power more especially desired. Nor did the popes attempt any strenuous opposition. Of their privileges and possessions they maintained what they could; the rest they resigned. It was remarked of Ferdinand of Naples, by Lorenzo de' Medici, in relation to a dispute of the former with the Roman see,—“He will make no difficulty of promising, but when it comes to the fulfilment, his deficiencies will be overlooked, as those of kings always are by the popes;”² for this spirit of opposition had penetrated even into Italy. Of Lorenzo de' Medici himself we are told that he followed the example of more powerful sovereigns in this respect, obeying just so much of the papal commands as suited him, and no more.¹ We shall be mistaken if we consider these movements as but so many acts of self-will : the life of the European nations was no longer pervaded and impressed as it had formerly been by ecclesiastical influence. The development of national character, and the separate organisation of the various monarchies, were making important advances. It thus became indispensable that the relation of the ecclesiastical to the secular powers should be thoroughly remodified. A very remarkable change had become obvious, even in the popes themselves.

¹ Instruttione piena della cose di Portogallo al Coadjutor di Bergamo, nuntio destinato in Portogallo. MS. among the Informationi politiche in the Royal Library of Berlin, vol. xii. Leo X conferred this patronage of the orders: “contentandosi il re di pagare grandissima compositione di detto patronato.”

² Lorenzo to Johannes de Lanfredinis. Fabroni Vita Laurentii Medici, ii. p. 362.

¹ Antonius Gallus (de rebus Genuensibus: Muratori Scriptt. R. It. xxiii. p. 281) says of Lorenzo : "Regum majorumque principum contumacem licentiam adversus Romanam ecclesiam sequebatur, de juribus pontificis, nisi quod ei videretur nihil permittens."

CHAPTER II

THE CHURCH AND HER TERRITORIES IN THE BEGINNING OF THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY

I. EXTENSION OF THE ECCLESIASTICAL STATES

WHATEVER judgment may be formed as to the popes of the earlier ages, it is certain that they had always important interests in view,—the duty of upholding an oppressed religion, that of contending with Paganism, of diffusing Christianity among the nations of the north, and of establishing an independent hierarchical government. To will, and to achieve some great object, is proper to the dignity of human nature ; and while such was their tendency, the popes were sustained in their lofty efforts ; but this spirit had passed away with the times by which it had been awakened. Schism had been suppressed, but it had become obvious that no hope remained of effecting a combined action against the enemy of the Church. Men would no longer give their lives to defend her from the Turks. It thus followed that her spiritual head now devoted himself to the interests of his temporal sovereignty, and pursued these with an avidity hitherto unknown. And this was in accordance with the temper and direction of the age : “ I had once thought,” remarks one of the speakers in the council of Basle, “ that the secular power should be wholly separate from that of the Church ; but I have now learned that virtue without force is but slightly respected, and that the pope, without the patrimony of the Church, would be merely the servant of kings and princes.” This speaker, who had yet sufficient influence in the assembly to determine the election of Pope Felix, declares it not so very objectionable that a pope should have sons, who might defend him against the aggression of tyrants.¹

This question was afterwards considered from a different point of view among the Italians. It was held to be a thing of course that a pope should provide for his own family and promote its interests; nay, a pontiff neglecting to do this would have exposed himself to injurious remarks. "Others," writes Lorenzo de' Medici to Innocent VIII, "have not so long postponed their efforts to attain the papal chair, and have concerned themselves little to maintain the retiring delicacy so long evinced by your holiness. Now is your holiness not only exonerated before God and man, but this honourable conduct may cause you to incur blame, and your reserve may be attributed to less worthy motives. Zeal and duty lay it on my conscience to remind your holiness that no man is immortal. Be the pontiff as important as he may in his own person, he cannot make his dignity and that importance hereditary; he cannot be said absolutely to possess anything but the honours and emoluments he has secured to his kindred."² Such were the counsels offered by him who was considered the wisest man of Italy. It is true that he had himself a direct interest in the matter, having given his daughter in marriage to a son of the pope, but he would never have dared to express himself thus boldly and without reserve, had not the views he was propounding been admitted without question among the higher classes of his country.

There is a certain internal connection between the fact that at this period the temporal princes were regularly seeking possession of the papal privileges, and the circumstance that enterprises partly secular now began to occupy the most earnest attention of the pope. He felt himself above all an Italian prince.

No long time had elapsed since the Florentines had overcome their neighbours the Pisans, and the house of Medici had established its authority over both. The power of the Sforza family in Milan, that of the house of Aragon in Naples, and of the Venetians in Lombardy, had all been achieved and consolidated within the memory of man. What was to prevent the pope from establishing a yet more exalted sovereignty for himself in those domains which were regarded as the patrimony of the Church,* but which were now under the rule of various independent chiefs?

¹ See an extract from this speech in Schröckh, vol. xxxii. p. 90.

² A letter of Lorenzo's without date, but apparently of the year 1489—since the fifth year of Innocent VIII is therein alluded to.—Fabroni, Vita Laurentii, ii. 390.

Pope Sixtus IV was the first pontiff by whom this purpose was undertaken with a fixed will and effectual results. He was strenuously, and most successfully, followed by Alexander VI. From Julius II this plan received a direction wholly unexpected, and of which the effect was permanent.

Sixtus IV (1471-1484) conceived the idea of founding a principality for his nephew, Girolamo Riario, in the fertile and beautiful plains of Romagna. The other Italian powers were already disputing the possession of, or the preponderance in, this fair district; and, if the question had been one of right, the pope had manifestly a better title than any one of these princes; but he was greatly their inferior in political force and the materials of war. He did not scruple to employ his spiritual influence—exalted by its nature and objects above all earthly purposes—for the furtherance of his worldly interests; nor did he shrink from debasing it by contact with the temporary intrigues in which these involved him. The Medici were especially obnoxious to the pope, and, mingling himself in the disputes of the Florentines, he gave rise to the suspicion that he had taken part in the conspiracy of the Pazzi, and is believed, as is well known, to have been privy to that assassination, committed by them before the very altar of a cathedral. He—the father of the faithful! When the Venetians ceased to favour the undertakings of his nephew, as for some time they had done, the pope was not content with leaving them to their fate, in the midst of a war to which he had himself impelled them; he even went so far as to excommunicate them for persisting in it.¹

¹ The Commentarii di Marino Sanuto on the war of Ferrara were printed at Venice in 1829—at page 56 he alludes to the defection of the

He acted with equal violence in Rome. The Colonna family, opponents of Riario, was persecuted by him with the most savage ferocity. He seized on their domain of Marino, and causing the prothonotary Colonna to be attacked in his own house, he took him prisoner, and put him to death. The mother of Colonna came to St. Celso, in Banchi, where the corpse lay, and lifting the severed head by its hair, she exclaimed: "Behold the head of my son. Such is the truth of the pope. He promised that my son should be set at liberty if Marino were delivered into his hands. He is possessed of Marino, and behold, we have my son,—but dead. Thus does the pope keep his word."¹

At such cost was it that Sixtus IV secured victory over his enemies, domestic and foreign. He did, in effect, exalt his nephew to be lord of Imola and Forlì; but if his temporal influence gained extension by these means, there can be no doubt that his spiritual authority and character lost infinitely more. There was even an attempt made to assemble a council against him.

Meanwhile Sixtus was soon to be far surpassed. No long time after him (1492) Alexander VI took possession of the papal throne.

The great object of Alexander, through his whole life, was to gratify his inclination for pleasure, his ambition, and his love of ease. When at length he had attained to the supreme spiritual dignity, he seemed also to have reached the summit of happiness. In spite of his advanced years, the exultation he felt seemed daily to impart to him a new life. No painful thought was permitted to disturb his repose for a single night. His only care was to seize on all means that might aid him to increase his power, and advance the wealth and dignity of his sons: on no other subject did he ever seriously bestow a thought.²

This one consideration was at the base of all his political pope, quoting the words of the Venetian ambassador: "Tutti vedranno, aver noi cominciato questa guerra di volontà del Papa; egli però si mosse a rompere la lega." [All men will see that we began this war by desire of the pope; he, however, took measures for the breaking of the league.]

¹ Alegretto Alegretti, Diari Sanesi, p. 817.

² Relazione di Polo Capello, 1500, MS. (App. No. 3).

alliances, and of those relations by which the events of the world were at that time so powerfully influenced. How the pope would proceed, in regard to the marriages, endowments, and advance of his children, became a question affecting the politics of all Europe.

The son of Alexander, Caesar Borgia, followed close on the footsteps of Riario. He began from the same point, and his first undertaking was to drive the widow of Riario from Imola and Forlì. He pressed forward to the completion of his designs with the most daring contempt of consequences; what Riario had only approached, or attempted, Caesar Borgia carried forward to its utmost results. Let us take a rapid glance at the means by which his purposes were accomplished.

The ecclesiastical states had hitherto been divided by the factions of the Guelphs and the Ghibellines, the first represented in Rome by the family of Orsini, the second by the house of Colonna. The popes had usually taken part with one or the other of these factions. Sixtus IV had done so; and his example was followed by Alexander and his son, who at first attached themselves to the Guelph, or Orsini party. This alliance enabled them very soon to gain the mastery of all their enemies. They drove the house of Sforza from Pesaro, that of Malatesta from Rimini, and the family of Manfredi from Faenza. They seized on those powerful, well-fortified cities, and thus commenced the foundation of an extensive lordship. But no sooner had they attained this point, no sooner had they freed themselves from their enemies, than they turned every effort against their friends. And it was in this that the practice of the Borgias differed from that of their predecessors, who had ever remained firmly attached to the party they had chosen; Caesar, on the contrary, attacked his own confederates, without hesitation or scruple. The duke of Urbino, from whom he had frequently received important aid, was involved, as in a network, by the machinations of Caesar, and, with difficulty saved his life, a persecuted fugitive in his own dominions.¹ Vitelli, Baglioni, and other chiefs of the Orsini faction, resolved to shew him that at least they were capable of resistance. But Caesar Borgia, declaring that "it is permitted to betray those who are the masters of all treasons," decoyed them into his snares, with profoundly calculated cruelty, and mercilessly deprived them of life. Having thus destroyed both parties, he stepped into their place, gathered the inferior nobility, who had been their adherents, around him, and took them into his pay; the territories he had seized on were held in subjection by force of terror and cruelty.

¹ Many interesting particulars regarding Caesar Borgia are to be found throughout the fourth volume of Sanuto's great MS. chronicles

The brightest hopes of Alexander were thus realised,—the nobles of the land were annihilated, and his house about to found a great hereditary dominion in Italy. But he had already begun to acquire practical experience of the evil which passions, aroused and unbridled, are capable of producing. With no relative or favourite would Caesar Borgia endure the participation of his power. His own brother stood in his way: Caesar caused him to be murdered and thrown into the Tiber. His brother-in-law was assailed and stabbed, by his orders, on the steps of his palace.¹ The wounded man was nursed by his wife and sister, the latter preparing his food with her own hands, to secure him from poison; the pope set a guard upon the house to protect his son-in-law from his son. Caesar laughed these precautions to scorn. "What cannot be done at noon-day," said he, "may be brought about in the evening." When the prince —as also certain of his letters; in one of these, written to the pope, he subscribes himself, "Vrae. Stis. humillimus servus et devotissima factura."

¹ Diario de Sebastiano de Branca de Telini, MS. Bibl. Barb. no. 1103, speaks of Caesar's atrocities in the manner following: "Il primo, il fratello che si chiamava lo duca di Gandia, lo fece buttar in fiume: fece ammazzare lo cognato, che era figlio del duca di Calabria, era lo più bello giovane che mai si vedesse in Roma; ancora fece ammazzare Vitellozzo della città di Castello et era lo più valenthuomo che fusse in quel tempo." [First, he caused his brother, called duke of Gandia, to be thrown into the river; he ordered his brother-in-law, who was son of the duke of Calabria, and the handsomest man ever seen in Rome, to be assassinated: again, he contrived the murder of Vitellozzo, the bravest man of that time.]—He calls the lord of Faenza "lo più bello figlio del mondo,"—the handsomest lad in the world. (App. No. 9.)

was on the point of recovery, he burst into his chamber, drove out the wife and sister, called in the common executioner, and caused his unfortunate brother-in-law to be strangled. Towards his father, whose life and station he valued only as means to his own aggrandisement, he displayed not the slightest respect or feeling. He slew Peroto, Alexander's favourite, while the unhappy man clung to his patron for protection, and was wrapped within the pontifical mantle. The blood of the favourite flowed over the face of the pope.

For a certain time the city of the apostles, and the whole state of the Church, were in the hands of Caesar Borgia. He is described as possessing great personal beauty, and so strong that in a bull-fight he would strike off the head of the animal at a single blow; of liberal spirit, and not without certain features of greatness, but given up to his passions and deeply stained with blood. How did Rome tremble at his name! Caesar required gold, and possessed enemies: every night were the corpses of murdered men found in the streets, yet none dared move; for who but might fear that his own turn would be next? Those whom violence could not reach were taken off by poison.¹

There was but one place on earth where such deeds were possible,—that, namely, where unlimited temporal power was united to the highest spiritual authority, where the laws, civil and ecclesiastical, were held in one and the same hand. This place was occupied by Caesar Borgia. Even depravity may have its perfection. The kindred of the popes have often distinguished themselves in the career of evil, but none have attained to the eminence of Caesar Borgia. He may be called a virtuoso in crime.

Was it not from the first one of the most essential tendencies of Christianity to render such a power impossible?

¹ To the manifold notices extant on this head, I have added something from Polo Capello (App. No. 3). On the death of distinguished men, people instantly suspected poisoning by the pope. With regard to the death of the cardinal of Verona, Sanuto has the following: "Si judica, sia stato attoscato per tuorli le facultà, perchè avanti che spirasse el papa mandò guardie attorno la casa." [He was supposed to be poisoned that the pope might take his riches, because Alexander placed guards around his house before he died.]

And yet, Christianity itself, and the very position of the supreme head of the Church, were made subservient to its existence.

There needed, then, no advent of a Luther, to prove to the world that these things were in direct opposition to the spirit of Christianity. Even at that time men complained that the pope was preparing the way for antichrist, and labouring for the interest of Satan rather than for the kingdom of God.¹

We do not follow the history of Alexander in its minute details. He once purposed, as is but too well authenticated, to destroy one of the richest cardinals by poison: but the latter contrived to win over the pope's chief cook by means of promises, entreaties, and gifts. The confection, prepared for the cardinal, was set before the pontiff himself; and Alexander expired from the effects of that poison which he had destined for another.² The consequences resulting after his death from his various enterprises were entirely different from those he had anticipated.

The papal families had always hoped to acquire hereditary sovereignty; but, for the most part, their authority came to an end with the life of the pope, and his kindred returned to the rank whence they had risen. If the Venetians beheld the career of Caesar Borgia with indifference, it was principally because they had no doubt but that matters would in this respect take their usual course: there were, perhaps, other motives in action, but this was the principal; they "judged all this to be merely a fire of straw, and believed that things would return to their former position, if Alexander were once dead."¹

¹ A loose sheet, MS. from Sanuto's chronicle.

² Successo de la Morte di Papa Alessandro, MS. (See App. No. 4.) I am aware that the fact of the poisoning has recently been called in question, since the diaries are silent on the matter and several contemporary accounts, public and private, know nothing of it. But even these authorities mention the supper at cardinal Hadrian's, where the pope was seized with the malady, which proved fatal a few days later. Cardinal Hadrian expressly spoke to the historian Giovio of the attempts at poisoning, by which he also had been threatened at that time. (See Romanische und germanische Geschichte, p. 213.) In my opinion it is impossible to deny the poisoning on any ground capable of being critically upheld, in the face of the unanimous opinion of contemporaries. Among the accounts of it that above quoted is the most trustworthy both in tone and contents.

On this occasion, they were nevertheless disappointed in their expectations: a pope followed, who did indeed make it his object to assume a position in direct contrast with that of the Borgias; but who pursued the same end, though he took different, and from that very circumstance, successful, means for his purpose. Julius II (1503-1513) enjoyed the incalculable advantage of finding opportunity for promoting the interests of his family by peaceable means: he obtained for his kindred the inheritance of Urbino. This done, he could devote himself, undisturbed by the importunities of his kindred, to the gratification of that innate love for war and conquest which was indeed the ruling passion of his life. To this he was invited by the circumstances of the times, and the consciousness of his eminent position: but his efforts were all for the Church,—for the benefit of the papal see. Other popes had laboured to procure principalities for their sons or their nephews: it was the ambition of Julius to extend the dominions of the Church. He must, therefore, be regarded as the founder of the papal states.

He found the whole territory in extreme confusion; all who had escaped by flight from the hand of Caesar had returned,—the Orsini, the Colonna, the Vitelli and Baglioni, Varani, Malatesta, and Montefeltri,—everywhere, throughout the whole land, were the different parties in movement; murderous contests took place in the very Borgo of Rome. Pope Julius has been compared with the Neptune of Virgil, when rising from the waves, with peace-inspiring countenance he hushes their storms to repose.² By prudence and good management, he disembarrassed himself even of Caesar Borgia, whose castles he seized and of whose dukedom he also gained possession. The lesser barons he kept in order with the more facility from the measures to this effect that had been taken by Caesar, but he was careful not to give them such cardinals for leaders as might awaken the ancient spirit of insubordination by ambitious enterprise.¹ The more powerful nobles, who refused him obedience, he attacked without further ceremony. His accession to the papal throne sufficed to reduce Baglioni (who had again made himself master of Perugia) within the limits of due subordination. Nor could Bentivoglio offer effectual resistance when required to resign that sumptuous palace which he had erected in Bologna, and whereon he had too hastily inscribed the well-known eulogy of his own good fortune : of this he saw himself deprived in his old age. The two powerful cities of Perugia and Bologna were thus subjected to the immediate authority of the pontifical throne.

¹ Priuli, Cronaca di Venezia, MS.—“Del resto poco stimavano, conoscendo, che questo acquisto, che all' hora faceva il duca Valentino, sarebhe foco di paglia, che poco dura.”

² Tommaso Inghirami, in Fea, Notizie intorno Raffaele Sanzio da Urbino, p. 57.

But with all this, Julius was yet far from having accomplished the end he had proposed to himself. The coasts of the papal states were in great part occupied by the Venetians ; they were by no means disposed to yield possession of them freely, and the pope was greatly their inferior in military power. He could not conceal from himself, that his attacking them would be the signal for a commotion throughout Europe. Should he venture to risk this?

Old as Julius now was, worn by the many vicissitudes of good and evil fortune experienced through a long life ; by the fatigues of war and exile, and most of all by the consequences of intemperance and licentious excess, he yet knew not what fear or irresolution meant ; in the extremity of age, he still retained that grand characteristic of manhood, an indomitable spirit. He felt little respect for the princes of his time, and believed himself capable of mastering them all. It was precisely from the tumults of a general war that he hoped to extract the fulfilment of his purposes ; his only care was to be always in command of money, to the end that he might seize the favourable moment with his utmost power.

¹ Machiavelli, Principe c. xi., is not the only authority who mentions this. See the complaint of the Roman barons under Julius II., in Jovius, Vita Pompeji Columnae, p. 140: "Principes urbis familias solito purpurei galeæ honore pertinaci pontificum livore privari."

He desired, as a Venetian of that day felicitously remarks, "to be lord and master of the game of the world."¹ Awaiting the fruition of his desires with an excess of impatience, he yet kept them confined to his own breast. If we inquire what enabled him to assume so commanding an attitude, we find it principally attributable to the fact that the state of public opinion in his day permitted the frank avowal of his natural tendencies; he was free to profess them openly; nay, to make them his boast. The re-establishment of the states of the Church was in that day considered not only a glorious, but even a religious enterprise; every effort of the pope was directed towards this end; by this one idea were all his thoughts animated; they were, if I may so express myself, steeled and moulded into this one unvarying form. In furtherance of this, his grand aim, he engaged in the boldest operations, risking all to obtain all. He took the field in person, and having stormed Mirandola, he pressed into the city across the frozen ditches and through the breach; the most disastrous reverses could not shake his purpose, but rather seemed to waken new resources within him. He was accordingly successful; not only were his own baronies rescued from the Venetians, but in the fierce contest that ensued, he at length made himself master of Parma, Piacenza, and even Reggio, thus laying the foundation of a power such as no pope had ever possessed before him. From Piacenza to Terracina the whole fair region admitted his authority. He had ever sought to present himself in the character of a liberator; governing his new subjects with a wise benignity, he secured their attachment and even devotion; the temporal princes were not without alarm at sight of so many warlike populations in allegiance to a pope. "Time was," says Machiavelli, "when no baron was so insignificant but that he might venture to brave the papal power; now, it is regarded with respect, even by a king of France."

¹ Sommario de la relation di Domenigo Trivixan, MS.--"Il papa vol esser il dominus et maistro del jocho del mundo." (App. No. 6.) There exists also a second relation by Polo Capello, of the year 1510, whence a few notices are inserted in the App. No. 5. Francesco Vettori, Sommario dell' istoria d' Italia, MS., says of him: "Julio più fortunato che prudente, e più animoso che forte, ma ambizioso e desideroso di grandezze oltre a modo." [Julius was more fortunate than prudent, and had more courage than strength, but was ambitious and desirous of grandeur to an immoderate degree.]

2. GROWTH OF A SECULAR SPIRIT IN THE CHURCH

It was an inevitable consequence that the whole body of the hierarchy should be influenced by the character and tendencies of its chief, that all should lend their best aid to the promotion of his purposes, and be themselves carried forward by the impulse thus given.

Not only the supreme dignity of the pontiff, but all other offices of the Church, were regarded as mere secular property. The pope nominated cardinals from no better motive than personal favour, the gratification of some potentate, or even, and this was no infrequent occurrence, for actual payment of money! Could there be any rational expectation that men so appointed would fulfil their spiritual duties? One of the most important offices of the Church, the Penitenziaria, was bestowed by Sixtus IV on one of his nephews. This office held a large portion of the power of granting dispensations; its privileges were still further extended by the pope, and in a bull issued for the express purpose of confirming them, he declares all who shall presume to doubt the rectitude of such measures, to be "a stiff-necked people and children of malice."¹ It followed as a matter of course that the nephew considered his office as a benefice, the proceeds of which he was entitled to increase to the utmost extent possible.

A large amount of worldly power was at this time conferred in most instances together with the bishoprics; they were held more or less as sinecures according to the degree of influence or court favour possessed by the recipient or his family. The Roman Curia thought only of how it might best derive advantage from the vacancies and presentations; Alexander extorted double annates or first-fruits, and levied double, nay triple tithes: there remained few things that had not become matter of purchase. The taxes of the papal chancery rose higher from day to day, and the comptroller, whose duty it was to prevent all abuses in that department, most commonly referred the revision of the imposts to those very men who had fixed their amount.¹ For every indulgence obtained from the datary's office, a stipulated sum was paid; nearly all the disputes occurring at this period between the several states of Europe and the Roman court arose out of these exactions, which the Curia sought by every possible means to increase, while the people of all countries as zealously strove to restrain them.

¹ Bull of the 9th of May, 1484.—"Quoniam nonnulli iniquitatis filii, elationis et pertinaciae suae spiritu assumpto, potestatem majori poenitentiarii nostri in dubium revocare praesumunt, decet nos adversus tales adhibere remedia," &c.—Bullarium Romanum, ed. Cocquelines, iii. p. 187.

Principles such as these necessarily acted on all ranks affected by the system based on them, from the highest to the lowest. Many ecclesiastics were found ready to renounce their bishoprics; but they retained the greater part of the revenues, and not infrequently the presentation to the benefices dependent on them also. Even the laws forbidding the son of an ecclesiastic to procure induction to the living of his father, and enacting that no ecclesiastic should dispose of his office by will, were continually evaded; for as all could obtain permission to appoint whomsoever he might choose as his coadjutor, provided he were liberal of his money, so the benefices of the Church became in a manner hereditary.

It followed of necessity that the performance of ecclesiastical duties was grievously neglected. In this rapid sketch, I confine myself to remarks made by conscientious prelates of the Roman court itself. "What a spectacle," they exclaim, "for a Christian who shall take his way through the Christian world, is this desolation of the churches! All the flocks are abandoned by their shepherds, they are given over to the care of hirelings"¹

¹ Reformationes cancellariae apostolicae S^mi Dⁿⁱ N^{ri} Pauli III, 1540, MS., in the Barberini library in Rome, enumerates all the abuses that have crept in since the days of Sixtus and Alexander. The grievances of the German nation relate especially to these "new devices" and the offices of the Roman chancery.

In all places incompetent persons were intrusted with the performance of clerical duties; they were appointed without scrutiny or selection. The incumbents of benefices were principally interested in finding substitutes at the lowest possible cost; thus the mendicant friars were frequently chosen as particularly suitable in this respect. These men occupied the bishoprics under the title (previously unheard of in that sense) of suffragans; the cures they held in the capacity of vicars.

Already the mendicant orders were in possession of extraordinary privileges, and these had been yet further extended by Sixtus IV, who was himself a Franciscan. They had the right of confessing penitents, administering the Lord's Supper, and bestowing extreme unction, as also that of burying within the precincts, and even in the habit of the order. All these privileges conferred importance as well as profit, and the mendicant friars enjoyed them in their utmost plenitude; the pope even threatened the disobedient secular clergy, or others, who should molest the orders, more particularly as regarded bequests, with the loss of their respective offices.²

The administration of parishes as well as that of bishoprics being now in the hands of the mendicant orders, it is manifest that they must have possessed enormous influence. The higher offices and more important dignities were monopolised, together with their revenues, by the great families and their dependants, shared only with the favourites of courts and of the Curia; the actual discharge of the various duties was confided to the mendicant friars who were upheld by the popes. They took active part also in the sale of indulgences, to which so unusual an extension was given at that time, Alexander VI being the first to declare officially that they were capable of releasing souls from purgatory. But the orders also had fallen into the extreme of worldliness. What intrigues were set on foot among them for securing the higher appointments! what eagerness was displayed at elections to be rid of a rival, or of a voter believed unfavourable! The latter were sent out of the way as preachers or as inspectors of remote parishes; against the former, they did not scruple to employ the sword, or the dagger, and many were destroyed by poison.¹ Meanwhile the comforts men seek from religion became mere matter of sale; the mendicant friars, employed at miserably low wages, caught eagerly at all contingent means of making profit.

¹ Consilium delectorum cardinalium et aliorum praelatorum de emendanda ecclesia S^{mo} D^{no} Paulo III ipso jubente, conscriptum anno 1538, printed more than once even at the time, and important as pointing out the evil, so far as it lay in the administration, precisely and without reserve. Long after it had been printed, this MS. still remained incorporated with MSS. of the Curia.

² Amplissimae gratiae et privilegia fratrum minorum conventualium ordinis S. Francisci quae propterea mare magnum nuncupantur, 31 Aug. 1474.—Bullarium Rom. iii. 3, 139. A similar bull was issued in favour of the Dominicans; this "mare magnum" attracted much attention in the Lateran council of 1512; but privileges, so at least was then the case, are more readily conferred than revoked.

"Woe is me!" exclaims one of the prelates before alluded to, "who are they that have turned my eyes to fountains of tears? Even those set apart and elect have fallen off; the vineyard of the Lord is laid waste. Were they to perish alone, this were an evil, yet one that might be endured: but since they are diffused through all Christendom as are the veins through the body, so must their corruption and downfall bring on the ruin of the world!"

3. INTELLECTUAL TENDENCY

Could we unfold the book of history, and lay its facts before our eyes in their connected reality; were the fleeting events of time to display their most concealed mechanism before us, as do the eternal forms of nature, how often should we not be comforted by perceiving in the first as in the last, that the fresh germ is hidden beneath the decay we deplore, and that new life is proceeding from death!

¹ In a voluminous report from Caraffa to Clement, which is given by Bromato, Vita di Paolo IV, in a mutilated form only, the passage following occurs in the manuscript of the monasteries:—"Si viene ad homicidi non solo col veneno, ma apertamente col coltello, e con la spada, per non dire con schiopetti." [They proceed to commit murders, not only by poison, but openly with the dagger and the sword, to say nothing of firearms.]

Deeply as we may lament the earthward tendency of spiritual things, and the corruption we have just described as existing in religious institutions; yet, but for these evils, the mind of man could with difficulty have entered on that peculiar path, which, more directly than any other, has led to his essential progress, moral and intellectual.

We cannot deny the fact, that ingenious, diversified, and profound as are the productions of the middle ages, they are yet based on views of the world, visionary in character and but little in accordance with the reality of things. Had the Church remained in full and conscious power, she would have adhered firmly to these views, narrowing and restricting as they were; but as she now was, the human intellect was left at liberty to seek a new development in a totally altered direction.

We may safely assert that, during those ages, the mind of man was necessarily held within the limits of a closely bounded horizon. The renewed acquaintance with antiquity removed this barrier, and opened a loftier, a more comprehensive, and a grander prospect.

Not that the classic authors were altogether unknown to the middle ages. The avidity with which the Arabs, to whom we are indebted for the introduction of so many branches of science into the West, collected and appropriated the works of the ancients, was but little inferior to the zeal with which the Italians of the 15th century pursued the same object. Caliph Mamoun does not lose by comparison in this respect with Cosimo de' Medici. There was nevertheless a difference, which, though at first sight it may seem of no great moment, is in my opinion all-important. The Arabs translated, but they often destroyed the originals. Their translations being pervaded, and thus transmuted, by their own peculiar ideas, the end was, that in their hands Aristotle was wrested, so to speak, into a system of theosophy; astronomy was perverted to astrology, and this last applied to medicine. They may thus be said to have aided in producing those visionary views of things to which we have before alluded. The Italians, on the contrary, extracted true profit from all they read. They proceeded from the Romans to the Greeks. The art of printing disseminated the originals throughout the world in copies innumerable; the true Aristotle superseded that falsified by the Arabs. Men studied science from the unaltered works of the ancients: geography directly from Ptolemy, botany from Dioscōrides, medicine from Galen and Hippocrates. How rapidly was the mind of man then delivered from the fantasies that had hitherto peopled the world—from the prejudices that had held his spirit in thrall!

We should, however, say too much were we to assert for these times an immediate evidence of originality in the cultivation of literature and science, the discovery of new truths, or the production of grand ideas; as yet men sought only to comprehend the ancients, none thought of going beyond them. The efficacy of the classic writers lay not so much in the impulse given to production and the growth of a creative spirit in literature, as in the habit of imitation that their works called forth.

But in this imitation will be found one of the causes most immediately contributing to the mental progress of that period.

Men sought to emulate the ancients in their own language. Leo X was an especial patron of this pursuit: he read the well-written introduction to the history of Jovius aloud in the circle of his intimates, declaring that since the works of Livy nothing so good had been produced. A patron of the Latin improvisators, we may readily conceive the charm he would find in the talents of Vida, who could set forth a subject like the game of chess, in the full tones of well-cadenced Latin hexameters. A mathematician, celebrated for expounding his science in elegant Latin, was invited from Portugal; in this manner he would have had theology and jurisprudence taught, and church history written.

Meanwhile it was not possible that things could remain stationary. Once arrived at this point, to whatever extent the direct imitation of the ancients in their own tongues might be carried, it was utterly insufficient to occupy the whole field of intellect; there was something in it incomplete, unsatisfactory, and it was so widely practised that this defect could not long escape the general notice. The new idea gradually arose of imitating the ancients in the mother tongue. The men of that day felt themselves to stand in the same position with regard to the classic authors, as did the Romans with regard to the Greeks : they determined no longer to confine themselves within the bounds of a contest in mere details ; on the broad fields of literature were they now resolved to vie with their masters, and with youthful enthusiasm did they rush forward on this new career.

The language of nations was fortunately receiving at this precise moment an improved and regulated form. The merit of Bembo does not consist so much in the finished style of his Latin, nor in those essays in Italian poetry still remaining to us, as in his well-devised and happily successful efforts to give correctness and dignity to his mother tongue, and to establish its construction according to fixed rules. This it is for which he has been praised by Ariosto ; he appeared precisely at the right moment, his own literary attempts serving to exemplify his doctrines.

If we examine the circle of works, formed on antique models, but of which the medium was that Italian so incomparable for harmony and flexibility, and which had been so skilfully adapted to the purposes of the writer, the following observations are forced on our attention.

But little success resulted from the efforts of those who sought too close an adherence to the classic model. Tragedies, like the "Rosmunda" of Rucellai, constructed, as the editors assure us, entirely after the antique : didactic poems, and those like "the Bees" of the same author (wherein we are from the very first referred to Virgil, who is turned to account in a thousand ways throughout the poem), were by no means favourably received, nor did they produce any real effect on the progress of literature. Comedies were from the first less restrained. It was in their very nature to assume the colour and impression of the time ; but the groundwork was almost invariably some fable of antiquity, or a plot borrowed from Plautus.¹ Men, even of such talent as was possessed by Bibbiena and Machiavelli, have failed to secure for their attempts in comedy the entire approbation of later times. In works of a different description, we occasionally perceive a species of conflict between their component parts, ancient and modern. Thus, in the "Arcadia" of Sanazzaro, how peculiarly do the prolix periods and stilted Latinity of the prose contrast with the simplicity, the earnest feeling, and rare melody of the verse!

¹ Marco Minio, among many other remarkable things, describes to the Signory the circumstances attending the first production of a comedy

If the success obtained, considerable as it was, did not arrive at perfection, that should by no means excite astonishment: a great example was at all events given—an attempt made that has proved infinitely productive; still, the modern elements of literature neither did nor could move with perfect freedom in the classic forms: the spirit was mastered by rules imposed on it from without, and in flagrant discord with its own nature.

But how could any thing really great be produced by mere imitation? The master-works of antiquity do assuredly possess their own influence as models, but this is the influence of mind on mind. It is the firm conviction of our own times that the beautiful type is to educate, to form, to excite, but never to enslave.

The most felicitous creation might, on the other hand, be reasonably hoped for, when the genius of those times should arouse itself to the production of a work, departing in form in Rome. His date is the 13th of March, 1519. (See App. No. 8.) "Finita dita festa (he is speaking of the Carnival) se andò ad una comedia, che fece el revrend^{mo} Cibo, dove è stato bellissima cosa, lo apparato tanto superbo che non si potia dire. La comedia fu questa, che fu fenta una Ferrara e in dita sala fu fata Ferrara preciso come la è. Dicono che Monsignor rev^{mo} Cibo venendo per Ferrara e volendo una comedia li fu data questa comedia. E sta tratta parte de li Suppositi di Plauto e dal Eunucho de Terenzio, molto bellissima." [The festival being finished, they went to a comedy given by Monsignore Cibo, where was a fine sight, with decoration more superb than I can tell. In the comedy there was feigned to be a Ferrara, and in the said hall was made Ferrara, exactly as it is. They say that Monsignor Cibo, passing through Ferrara, and wishing to have a comedy, one was given him; it was taken from the Suppositi of Plautus and the Eunuchus of Terence—very beautiful.] He doubtless means the Suppositi of Ariosto, but we may remark that he mentions neither the name of the author nor the title of the piece, only whence it was taken.

and matter from the writers of antiquity, and affected by their internal influence only.

The romantic epos owes its peculiar charm to the fact that it fulfils these conditions. A Christian fable, combining the religious influence with heroic interests, supplied the groundwork: the most prominent figures were depicted by a few bold broad general traits; efficient situations, but slightly developed, were ready to the hand of the poet; as was the poetic expression which was presented to him immediately from the common colloquy of the people. In aid of all this came the tendency of the age to adapt itself to the antique, of which the humanising influences coloured and informed the whole. How different is the Rinaldo of Bojardo—noble, modest, replete with a joyous love of action and adventure—from the desperate son of Aimon of the old legend! How does the extravagant, the violent, the gigantic of the earlier representation, become transformed into the intelligible, the graceful, and the charming! There is doubtless something attractive and agreeable in the simplicity of the unadorned old stories; but how greatly is our enjoyment increased, when the melody of Ariosto's verse floats along with us, and we pass from one bright picture to another in companionship with a cultivated mind, and frank cheerful spirit! The unlovely and formless has wrought itself into beauty, symmetry, and music.¹

A keen susceptibility to pure beauty of form, with the power of expressing it, is manifested at a few favoured periods only; the end of the 15th and beginning of the 16th centuries was one of them. How can I hope to indicate, were it but in outline, the wealth of art, whether in conception or practice, that filled those times—the fervid devotion that gave life to every effort? It may be confidently asserted, that all that is most beautiful in the productions of later ages in architecture, sculpture, or painting, is due to this short period. The tendency of the time was not towards abstract reasonings, but rather towards a vivid life and active practice: in this earnest medium did men live and move. I may even say, that the fortress erected by the prince against his enemy, and the note written by the philologist on the margin of his author, have a certain something in common : a severe and chaste beauty forms the groundwork of all the productions of the period.

¹ I have endeavoured to work out this subject in a special treatise, "Zur Geschichte der italienischen Poesie." (Transactions of the Royal Academy of Sciences, Berlin, 1835.)

We cannot, however, refuse to acknowledge that when art and poetry took possession of religious materials, they did not leave the import of them unchanged. The romantic epos, presenting us with a legend of the Church, is usually in direct opposition to the spirit of that legend. Ariosto found it needful to dismiss from his fable the background containing its original signification.

In earlier times the share of religion was equal with that of art in every work of the painter or sculptor ; but no sooner had the breath of antiquity been felt on the bosom of art, than the bonds that had chained her to subjects exclusively religious were cast from her spirit. We see this change manifest itself more decidedly from year to year even in the works of Raphael. People may blame this, if they please ; but it would seem to be certain that the co-operation of the profane element was necessary to the full development and bloom of art.

And was it not profoundly significant that a pope should himself resolve to demolish the ancient basilica of St. Peter, the metropolitan church of Christendom, every part of which was hallowed, every portion crowded with monuments that had received the veneration of ages, and determine to erect a temple, planned after those of antiquity, on its site ? This was a purpose exclusively artistic. The two factions then dividing the jealous and contentious world of art, united in urging Julius II to this enterprise. Michael Angelo desired a fitting receptacle for that monument to the pope which he proposed to complete on a vast scale and with that lofty grandeur which he has exhibited in his Moses. Yet more pressing was Bramante. It was his ambition to have space for the execution of the bold project, long before conceived, of raising high in air, on colossal pillars, an exact copy of the Pantheon, in all the majesty of its proportions. Many cardinals remonstrated, and it would even appear that there was a general opposition to the plan ; so much of personal affection attaches itself to every old church, how much more then to this, the chief sanctuary of Christendom!¹ But Julius was not accustomed to regard contradiction; without further consideration he caused one-half of the old church to be demolished, and himself laid the foundation-stone of the new one.

Thus rose again, in the heart and centre of the Christian worship, those forms in which the spirit of the antique rites had found so eloquent an expression. At San Pietro in Montorio, and over the blood of the martyr, Bramante erected a chapel in the light and cheerful form of a peripteros.

If this involve a contradiction, it was one that pervaded the whole existence and affected all the habits of the times.

Men frequented the Vatican, less to kneel in devotion on the threshold of the apostles than to admire those great works of ancient art that enriched the dwelling of the pontiff—the Belvedere Apollo and the Laocoon.

It is true that the pope was exhorted as earnestly as ever to make war against infidels. I find this, for example, in a preface of Navagero;² but the writer was not concerning himself for the interests of Christianity; his hope was, that the pontiff would thus recover the lost writings of the Greeks and perhaps of the Romans.

In this exuberance of effort and production, of intellect and art, and in the enjoyment of increasing temporal power attached to the highest spiritual dignity, lived Leo X. Men have questioned his title to the honour of giving his name to the period, and he had not perhaps any great merit in doing so, but he was indubitably favoured by circumstances. His character had been formed in the midst of those elements that fashioned the world of his day, and he had liberality of mind and susceptibility of feeling that fitted him for the furtherance of its progress and the enjoyment of its advantages. If he found pleasure in the efforts of those who were but imitators of the Latin, still more would the works of his contemporaries delight him. It was in his presence that the first tragedy was performed, and (in spite of the objections liable to be found in a play imitating Plautus) the first comedy also that was produced in the Italian language; there is, indeed, scarcely one that was not first seen by him. Ariosto was among the acquaintance of his youth. Machiavelli composed more than one of his works expressly for him. His halls, galleries, and chapels were filled by Raphael with the rich ideal of human beauty, and with the purest expression of life in its most varied forms. He was a passionate lover of music, a more scientific practice of which was just then becoming diffused throughout Italy; the sounds of music were daily heard floating through the palace, Leo himself humming the airs that were performed. This may all be considered a sort of intellectual sensuality, but it is at least the only one that does not degrade the man. Leo X was full of kindness and ready sympathies; rarely did he refuse a request, and when compelled to do so evinced his reluctance by the gentlest expressions. "He is a good man," says an observant ambassador, "very bounteous and kindly; he would avoid all disorders if it were not that his kinsmen incite him to them."¹ "He is learned," says another, "and the friend of the learned; religious too, but he will enjoy his life."² It is true that he did not always attend to the pontifical proprieties. He would sometimes leave Rome—to the despair of his master of the ceremonies—not only without a surplice, but, as that officer ruefully bemoans in his journal, "What is worst of all, even with boots on his feet!" It was his custom to pass the autumn in rural pleasures. At Viterbo he amused himself with hawking, and at Corneto with hunting the stag. The lake of Bolsena afforded him the pleasure of fishing, or he would pass a certain time at his favourite residence of Maliana, whither he was accompanied by improvisatori and other men of light and agreeable talents, capable of making every hour pass pleasantly. Towards winter he returned with his company to Rome, which was now in great prosperity, the number of its inhabitants having increased full one-third in a very few years. Here the mechanic found employment, the artist honour, and safety was assured to all. Never had the court been more animated, more graceful, more intellectual. In the matter of festivities, whether spiritual or temporal, no cost was spared, nor was any expenditure found too lavish when the question was of amusements, theatres, presents, or marks of favour. There was high jubilee when it was known that Giuliano de' Medici meant to settle with his young wife in Rome. "God be praised," writes Cardinal Bibbiena to him, "for here we lack nothing but a court with ladies."

¹ The following passage is given by Fea, from the unprinted work of Panvinus (De rebus antiquis memorabilibus et de praestantia basilicae S. Petri Apostolorum Principis, &c.):—"Qua in re (the project of the new building) adversos pene habuit cunctorum ordinum homines et praesertim cardinales; non quod novam non cuperent basilicam magnificentissimam extrui, sed quia antiquam toto terrarum orbe venerabilem, tot sanctorum sepulchris augustissimam, tot celeberrimis in ea gestis insignem funditus deleri ingemiscant."

² Naugerii Praefatio in Ciceronis Orationes, t. i.

¹ Zorzi.—"Per il papa, non voria ni guerra ni fatiche, ma questi soi lo intriga." (See App. 7.)

² Marco Minio, Relazione.—"E docto, e amador di docti; ben religioso, ma vol viver." He calls him "bona persona." (See App. No. 8.)

The debasing sensuality of Alexander VI cannot fail to be regarded with horror and loathing; in the court of Leo X there were few things deserving absolute blame, although we cannot but perceive that his pursuits might have been more strictly in accordance with his position as supreme head of the church.

Easily does life veil its own incongruities as they pass, but no sooner do men set themselves to ponder, examine, and compare, than at once they become fully apparent to all.

Of true Christian sentiment and conviction there could be no question in such a state of things; they were, on the contrary, directly opposed.

The schools of philosophy disputed as to whether the reasonable soul were really immaterial and immortal—but one single spirit only and common to all mankind—or whether it were absolutely mortal.

Pietro Pomponazzo, the most distinguished philosopher of the day, did not scruple to uphold the latter opinion. He compared himself to Prometheus, whose heart was devoured by the vulture, because he had sought to steal fire from Jupiter; but with all the painful efforts Pomponazzo could make, with all his subtlety, he could arrive at no other result than this: "If the lawgiver declared the soul immortal, he had done so without troubling himself about the truth."¹

Nor are we to believe that these opinions were confined to a few, or held only in secret. Erasmus declares himself astonished at the blasphemies that met his ears; attempts were made to prove to him—a foreigner—by passages from Pliny, that the souls of men are absolutely identical with those of beasts.²

While the populace had sunk into almost heathen superstition, and expected their salvation from mere ceremonial observances, but half understood, the higher classes were manifesting opinions of a tendency altogether anti-religious.

How profoundly astonished must Luther have been, on visiting Italy in his youth! At the very moment when the sacrifice of the mass was completed, did the priests utter blasphemous words in denial of its reality!

It was even considered characteristic of good society, in Rome, to call the principles of Christianity in question. "One passes," says P. Ant. Bandino,³ "no longer for a man of cultivation, unless one put forth heterodox opinions regarding the Christian faith." At court, the ordinances of the Catholic church, and of passages from holy Scripture, were made subjects of jest—the mysteries of the faith had become matter of derision.

¹ Pomponazzo was very seriously assailed on this subject, as appears from extracts of papal letters by Contelori, and from other proofs. "Petrus de Mantua," we are thus told, "asseruit quod anima rationalis secundum propria philosophiae et mentem Aristotelis sit seu videatur mortalis, contra determinationem concilii Lateranensis: papa mandat ut dictus Petrus revocet; alias contra ipsum procedatur." 13 June, 1518.

² Burigny: Life of Erasmus, i. 139. Here may also be quoted the following passage from Paul Canensius in the Vita Pauli II:—"Pari quoque diligentia e medio Romanae curiae nefandum nonnullorum juvenum sectam scelestamque opinionem sustulit, qui depravatis moribus asserebant nostram fidem orthodoxam potius quibusdam sanctorum astutiis quam veris rerum testimoniis subsistere." A very decided materialism is evinced by The Triumph of Charlemagne, a poem by Ludovici, as may be seen from the quotations of Daru in the 40th book of his Histoire de Venise.

³ In Caracciolo's MS. life of Paul IV. "In quel tempo non pareva fosse galantuomo e buon cortegiano colui che de' dogmi della chiesa non aveva qualche opinion erronea ed heretica."

We thus see how all is enchained and connected—how one event calls forth another. The pretensions of temporal princes to ecclesiastical power awaken a secular ambition in the popes, the corruption and decline of religious institutions elicit the development of a new intellectual tendency, till at length the very foundations of the faith become shaken in the public opinion.

4. OPPOSITION TO THE PAPACY IN GERMANY

There appears to me something especially remarkable in the dispositions of Germany, as exhibited at this moment. In the intellectual development we have just been considering, her part was a decided and influential one, but conducted in a manner peculiar to herself.

In Italy, the promoters of classical study, and those from whom the age received its impulse towards it, were poets; as, for example, Boccaccio and Petrarch. In Germany, the same effect was due to a religious fraternity, the Hieronymites,—a community united by a life of labour, passed in sequestration from the world. It was one of this brotherhood, the profound and blameless mystic, Thomas à Kempis, from whose school proceeded all those earnest and venerable men who, first drawn to Italy by the light of ancient learning, newly kindled there, afterwards returned to pour its beneficent influence over the breadth of Germany.¹

The difference thus observable in the beginning was equally apparent in the subsequent progress.

In Italy, the works of the ancients were studied for the sciences they contained; in Germany, for the aids they offered to the study of philosophy. The Italians sought a solution of the highest problems that can occupy the human intellect, if not by independent thought, at least with the help of the ancients; the Germans collected all that was best throughout antiquity for the education of their youth. The Italians were attracted towards the ancients by the beauty of form; this they sought to imitate, and thence proceeded to the formation of a national literature: among the Germans, these same studies took a more spiritual direction. The fame of Erasmus and Reuchlin is familiar to all; if we inquire what constitutes the principal merit of the latter, we find it to be his having written the first Hebrew grammar,—a monument of which he hoped, as did the Italian poets of their works, that “it would be more durable than brass;” as by him the study of the Old Testament was first facilitated, so was that of the New Testament indebted to Erasmus. To this it was that his attention was devoted; it was he who first caused it to be printed in Greek, and his Paraphrases and Commentaries on it have produced an effect far surpassing the end he had proposed to himself.

¹ Meiners has the merit of having first brought to light this genealogy from the Daventria Illustrata of Revius. (Lebensbeschreibungen berühmter Männer aus den Zeiten der Wiederherstellung der Wissenschaften, ii. 308.)

While the public mind of Italy had become alienated from, and even opposed to, the Church, an effect in some respects similar had taken place in Germany. There, that freedom of thought which can never be wholly suppressed, gained admission into the literary world, and occasionally displayed itself in decided scepticism. A more profound theology, also, had arisen, from sources but imperfectly known, and though discountenanced by the Church, had never been put down; this now formed an essential part of the literary movement in Germany. In this point of view, I consider it worthy of remark, that, even as early as the year 1513, the Bohemian brethren made advances to Erasmus, whose modes of thought were, nevertheless, entirely different from their own.¹

Thus, on either side the Alps, the progress of the age was in direct opposition to ecclesiastical ascendancy. In Italy this tendency was associated with science and literature; in Germany it arose from biblical studies, and a more profound theology. There it was negative and incredulous; here it was positive, and full of an earnest faith. There it destroyed the very foundations of the Church; here the desire was to construct the edifice anew. In Italy it was mocking and sarcastic, but ever pliant and deferential to power; in Germany, full of a serious indignation, and deeply determined on a stubbornness of assault such as the Roman church had never before experienced.

¹ Füsslin: Kirchen- und Ketzergeschichte, ii. 82.

The fact that this was first directed against the abuses arising from the sale of indulgences, has sometimes been regarded as mere matter of accident; but as the alienation of that which is most essentially spiritual, involved in the doctrine of indulgences, laid open and gave to view the weakest point in the whole system—that worldliness of spirit now prevalent in the Church—so was it, of all things, best calculated to shock and offend the convictions of those earnest and profound thinkers, the German theologians. A man like Luther, whose religion was sincere and deeply felt, whose opinions of sin and justification were those propounded by the early German theologians, and confirmed in his mind by the study of Scripture, which he had drunk in with a thirsting heart, could not fail to be revolted and shocked by the sale of indulgences. Forgiveness of sins to be purchased for money! this must of necessity be deeply offensive to him, whose conclusions were drawn from profound contemplation of the eternal relation subsisting between God and man, and who had learned to interpret Scripture for himself.

It is true that he did, by all means, oppose the sale of indulgences; but, led on from step to step by the ill-founded and prejudiced opposition he encountered, he was presently made aware of the connection subsisting between this monstrous abuse and the general disorders of the Church. His was not a nature to shrink from, or tremble at, the most extreme measures. With unhesitating boldness, he attacked the head of the Church himself. From the midst of an order, hitherto the most submissive adherents and devoted defenders of the papacy, that of the Friars-Mendicant, now rose the most determined and most vigorous opponent the pontificate had yet known. And as Luther, with the utmost precision and acuteness, held up its own declared principles in the face of that power which had so widely departed from them,—as he did but express truths of which all men had long been convinced,—as his opposition, the full import of which had not yet become apparent, was acceptable to those who rejected the faith, and yet, because it was undertaken in defence of those principles, was consonant to the mind of the earnest believer,—so had his writings an incalculable effect, and were rapidly disseminated, not in Germany alone, but through the whole world.

CHAPTER III

POLITICAL COMPLICATIONS. — CONNECTION BETWEEN THESE AND THE REFORMATION

THE secular spirit that had now taken possession of the papacy had occasioned a twofold movement in the world. The one was religious ; a falling off from the Church had begun, whence it was manifest that the future would behold results of immeasurable consequence. The second movement was of a political nature ; the conflicting elements so long in action were still fermenting violently, and could not fail to produce new combinations. These two movements, their effect on each other, and the contests to which they gave rise, imposed their influence on the history of the popedom during a period of ages.

Well would it be for states and princes, were all convinced that no essential good can result to them except from their own exertions,—that no benefit is real unless acquired by their own native strength and effort !

While the Italian powers were labouring to conquer each other by foreign aid, they were in effect destroying that independence which they had enjoyed during the fifteenth century, and exposing their common country to be the prize of a foreign victor. A large share in this result must be imputed to the popes. It is certain that they had now acquired a sovereignty such as had never before been possessed by the papal see ; but this was by no means attributable to themselves,—it was to the French, the Spaniards, the Germans, and Swiss, that they were indebted for the whole. Very little would Caesar Borgia have accomplished, had it not been for his alliance with Louis XII ; nor could Julius II have escaped destruction, enlarged as were his views, and heroic his achievements, had he not been upheld by the Spaniards and Swiss. How could those who had gained the victory fail to seek their utmost profit in the preponderance it procured them? Julius did not neglect to ask himself this question, and sought to maintain a kind of equipoise by employing only the least formidable,—the Swiss namely; believing he might lead them as he pleased.

But the event failed to justify this expectation: two great powers arose, and these contended, if not for the sovereignty of the world, at least for supremacy in Europe; with neither of these could the pontiff hope to compete, and it was in Italy that they sought their battle-ground.

The French were the first to show themselves: soon after the accession of Leo X they appeared, in greater force than any with which they had ever before crossed the Alps, to regain possession of Milan. Francis I, in all the ardour of his chivalrous youth, was their leader. Everything depended on the question of whether the Swiss could resist him or not; therefore it was that the battle of Marignano had so paramount an importance; for here this question was resolved. The Swiss were totally routed, and since that defeat they have exercised no independent influence in Italy.

The battle had remained undecided on the first day, and a report of victory to the Swiss having reached Rome, bonfires had been lighted throughout the city. The earliest intelligence of the second day's battle and its result was received by the envoy of the Venetians, who were in alliance with Francis, and had in no small degree contributed to decide the fortune of the day. At a very early hour of the morning he hastened to the Vatican to communicate his intelligence to the pope, who came forth when but half-dressed to give him audience. "Your Holiness," said the envoy, "gave me bad news last night, and they were false beside; to-day I bring you good news, and they are true: the Swiss are beaten." He then read the letters he had received, which, being written by men known to the pope, left no doubt remaining.¹ Leo did not conceal his profound alarm. "What then will become of us? What will become even of yourselves?" he inquired. "We hope the best for both." "Sir Envoy," replied the pope, "we must throw ourselves into the king's arms and cry miseri-cordia."¹

¹ Summario de la relatione di Zorzi.—"E cussi desmissiato venne fuori non compito di vestir. L' orator disse: Pater sante, eri v^{ra} sant^a

In effect, the French acquired a decided preponderance in Italy by this victory. Had it been vigorously followed up, neither Tuscany nor the states of the Church, both so easily incited to revolt, could have offered them resistance, and the Spaniards would have found it sufficiently difficult to maintain themselves in Naples. "The king," says Francesco Vettori, explicitly, "might become lord of Italy." How much was at this moment depending on Leo!

Lorenzo de' Medici said of his three sons, Giuliano, Pietro, and Giovanni, that the first was good, the second a fool, but that for the third, Giovanni, he was prudent. This third was pope Leo X; and he now shewed himself equal to the difficult position into which he had fallen.

Contrary to the advice of his cardinals, he betook himself to Bologna to have a conference with the king:² then it was that they concluded the Concordat (before alluded to), in which they divided between them the rights of the Gallican church; Leo was compelled to give up Parma and Piacenza, but he succeeded in dispersing the storm that had threatened him, persuaded the king to return, and himself remained secure in the possession of his dominions.

How fortunate this was for the pontiff, may be seen from the effects immediately produced by the mere approach of the French. It is highly deserving of remark that Leo, after his allies had been defeated and himself obliged to yield up a portion of his territory, was yet able to retain mi dette una cattiva nuova e falsa, io la darò ozi una bona e vera, zoè Sguizari è rotti." The letters were from Pasqualigo, Dandolo, and others. (App. No. 7.)

¹ "Domine orator, vederemo quel fara re christ^{mo} e ci metteremo in le so man dimandando misericordia. Lui, orator, disse: Pater sante, vostra santità non avrà mal alcuno."

² Zorzi.—"Questo papa è savio e pratico di stato, e si pensò con li suoi consultori di venir abocharsi a Bologna con vergogna di la sede (ap.): molti cardinali, tra i qual il cardinal Hadriano, lo disconsegava; pur vi volse andar."

his hold on two provinces, but lately conquered, accustomed to independence, and replete with every element of revolt.

Leo X has been constantly censured for his attack on Urbino, a princely house, which had afforded refuge and hospitality to his own family when driven into exile. The provocation to this attack, and Leo's motive for resolving on it, were as follow:—The duke of Urbino, being in the pope's pay, had deserted him at a very critical moment; the pontiff then said that "if he did not visit him with punishment for this, there would be no baron in the states of the Church so powerless as not to venture opposing him. He had found the pontificate respected; nor should it cease to be while in his hands."¹ As, however, the duke was upheld by the French, at least in secret,—as he had partisans throughout the States, and even in the college of cardinals, a contest with him was likely to prove dangerous: it was no easy matter to expel so warlike a prince. Leo was occasionally seen to tremble at the receipt of unfavourable news, and was often reduced to extreme perplexity. It is said, too, that a plan was formed for poisoning him in the course of treatment for a malady under which he laboured. The pope did at length succeed in defending himself from this enemy, but we have seen that it was not without great difficulty. The defeat of his party by the French affected him, not only in his capital, but even in his very palace.²

The second great power had meanwhile become consolidated. How extraordinary does it seem that one and the same prince should hold the sceptre in Vienna, Brussels, Valladolid, Saragossa, and Naples! Nor was this all, his rule extended even to another continent; yet this was brought about almost imperceptibly by a series of family alliances. This aggrandizement of the house of Austria, which linked together so many different countries, was one of the most important and eventful changes that Europe had yet witnessed. At that moment, when the nations were diverging from the point that had hitherto been their common centre, they were again gathered, by their political circumstances, into new combinations and formed into a new system. The power of Austria instantly placed itself in opposition to the preponderance of France. With his imperial dignity, Charles V acquired legal claims to supremacy, at least in Lombardy. This being the state of things in Italy, war was kindled with but slight delay.

¹ Franc. Vettori (Sommario della Storia d' Italia), intimately connected with the Medici, gives this explanation (see App. 16). The defender of Francesco Maria, Giov. Batt. Leoni, relates facts tending very nearly to the same import. (Vita di Francesco Maria, p. 166 ff.)

² Fea, in the Notizie intorno Raffaele, p. 35, has given the sentence against the three cardinals from the Acts of the Consistory, and this refers distinctly to their understanding with Francesco Maria.

The popes, as we have before remarked, had hoped to secure entire independence by the extension of their states; they now found themselves hemmed in between two greatly superior powers. A pope was not so insignificant that he could remain neutral in a strife between them, neither was he sufficiently powerful to secure preponderance for that scale into which he should cast his weight; his safety could only be found in the dexterous use of passing events. Léo is reported to have said, that when a man has formed a compact with one party, he must none the less take care to negotiate with the other;¹ this double-tongued policy was forced on him by the position in which he was placed.

But the pontiff could not seriously entertain a doubt as to the party which it was his interest to adopt; for had he not felt it of infinite importance to regain Parma and Piacenza, had the promise of Charles V, that an Italian should hold possession of Milan, a thing so much to his advantage, been insufficient to determine his choice, there was still another consideration, and one that appears to me entirely conclusive—this was a motive connected with religion.

Throughout the whole period of time that we are contemplating, there was no assistance so much desired by the temporal sovereigns in their disputes with the popes as that of a spiritual opposition to their decrees. Charles VIII of France had no more efficient ally against Alexander VI than the Dominican Girolamo Savonarola at Florence,

¹ Suriano, Relatione di 1533.—"Dicesi del Papa Leone, che quando 'l aveva fatto lega con alcuno prima, soleva dir che però non si dovea restar de tratar cum lo altro principe opposto."

When Louis XII had resigned all hope of a reconciliation with Julius II, he summoned a council to meet at Pisa, and this, though producing no great effect, yet excited much alarm in Rome. But when had the pope so bold or so prosperous an opponent as Luther? The mere fact that so fearless a foe to the papacy had made his appearance, the very existence of such a phenomenon, was highly significant, and imparted to the person of the reformer a decided political importance. It was thus that Maximilian considered it, nor would he permit injury of any kind to be offered to this monk; he caused him to be specially recommended to the elector of Saxony—"there might come a time when he would be needed"—and from that moment the influence of Luther increased day by day. The pope could neither convince nor alarm this impracticable opponent, neither could he get him into his hands. It must not be supposed that Leo failed to perceive the danger; more than once did he urge the many theologians and men of talent by whom he was surrounded in Rome, to engage themselves in contest with this formidable controversialist. One resource yet remained to him. Might he not hope that by an alliance with the emperor he should secure the aid of that sovereign for the repression of these religious innovations, as it was certain that they would be protected and even promoted by the emperor, should Leo declare against him?

The affairs of Europe, religious and political, were the subject of discussion in the diet of Worms (1521). Here the pope entered into a league with the emperor for the recovery of Milan. On the day when this alliance was concluded, the edict of outlawry proclaimed against Luther is said to have been also dated. There may have been other motives operating to produce this act of proscription; but no one will persuade himself that there was not an immediate connection between the outlawry and the political treaty.

And no long time elapsed before the twofold effect of this league became manifest.

Luther was seized in the Wartburg and kept in concealment.¹ The Italians at first refused to believe that

¹ Luther was believed to be dead; it was said that he had been murdered by the partisans of the pope. Palavicini (Istoria del Concilio

Charles had allowed him to escape, from a conscientious regard to the safe-conduct he had granted. "Since he perceived," said they, "that the pope greatly feared Luther's doctrine, he designed to hold him in check with that rein." ¹

However this may be, Luther certainly disappeared for some time from the stage of the world; he was, to a certain extent, without the pale of the law, and the pope had in any case procured the adoption of decisive measures against him.

The combined forces of the pope and emperor were meanwhile successful in Italy; one of Leo's nearest relations, Cardinal Giulio de' Medici, the son of his father's brother, was himself in the field, and entered with the conquering army into Milan. It was asserted in Rome that the pope had designs of conferring on him the duchy; but I find no distinct proof of this, nor do I think the emperor would readily have acceded to it: even without this, however, the advantages gained by Rome were enormous. Parma and Piacenza were recovered, the French were compelled to withdraw, and the pope might safely calculate on exercising great influence over the new sovereign of Milan.

It was a crisis of infinite moment: a new state of things had arisen in politics—a great movement had commenced in the Church. The aspect of affairs permitted Leo to flatter himself that he should retain the power of directing the first, and he had succeeded in repressing the second. He was still young enough to indulge the anticipation of fully profiting by the results of this auspicious moment.

Strange and delusive destiny of man! The pope was at his villa of Malliana, when he received intelligence that his party had triumphantly entered Milan; he abandoned himself to the exultation arising naturally from the successful completion of an important enterprise, and looked cheerfully on at the festivities his people were preparing on the occasion.

di Trento, i. c. 28) infers from the letters of Alexander, that the nuncios were in danger of their lives on that account.

¹ Vettori: "Carlo si excusò di non poter procedere più oltre rispetto al salvocondotto; ma la verità fu, che conoscendo che il papa temeva molti di questa doctrina di Luthero, lo volle tenere con questo freno."

He paced backwards and forwards till deep in the night between the window and a blazing hearth¹—it was the month of November. Somewhat exhausted, but still in high spirits, he arrived in Rome, and the rejoicings there celebrated for his triumph were not yet concluded, when he was attacked by a mortal disease. “Pray for me,” said he to his servants, “that I may yet make you all happy.” We see that he loved life, but his hour was come, he had not time to receive the sacrament nor extreme unction. So suddenly, so prematurely, and surrounded by hopes so bright, he died,—“as the poppy fadeth.”²

The Roman populace could not forgive their pontiff for dying without the sacraments—for having spent so much money, and yet leaving large debts. They pursued his corpse to its grave with insult and reproach. “Thou hast crept in like a fox,” they exclaimed; “like a lion hast thou ruled us, and like a dog hast thou died.”³ After-times, on the contrary, have designated a century and a great epoch in the progress of mankind, by his name.

We have called him fortunate. Once he had overcome the first calamity, that after all affected other members of his house rather than himself, his destiny bore him onward from pleasure to pleasure, and from success to success; the most adverse circumstances were turned to his elevation and prosperity. In a species of intellectual intoxication, and in the ceaseless gratification of all his wishes, did his life flow on. This was in a great measure the result of his own better qualities—of that liberal kindness, that activity of intellect, and ready perception of good in others, which were among his distinguishing characteristics. These qualities are the fairest gifts of nature—felicitous peculiarities, rarely acquired; but when possessed how greatly do they enhance all life's enjoyments! His state affairs did but slightly disturb the current of his pleasures: he did not concern himself with the details, looking only to leading facts; thus he was not oppressed by labour, since it called into exercise the noblest faculties of his intellect only. It was perhaps precisely because he did not chain his thoughts to business, through every day and hour, that his management of affairs was so comprehensive. Whatever the perplexity of the moment, never did he lose sight of the one guiding thought that was to light his way; invariably did the essential and moving impulse emanate directly from himself. At the moment of his death, the purposes he had proposed to himself in the policy he had pursued were all tending towards the happiest results. It may be considered a further proof of his good fortune that his life was not prolonged. Times of a different character succeeded, and it is difficult to believe that he could have opposed a successful resistance to their unfavourable influences. The whole weight of them was experienced by his successors.

¹ Copia di una lettera di Roma alli Signori Bolognesi, a dì 3 Dec. 1521, scritta per Bartholomeo Argilelli.—See vol. xxxii. of Sanuto. The intelligence reached the pope on the 24th of November, during the Benedicite. This also he accepted as a particularly good omen—“Questa è una buona nuova che havete portato,” he remarked. The Swiss immediately began to fire feux de joie. Leo requested them to desist, but in vain.

² There was instant suspicion of poison. Lettera di Hieronymo Bon a suo barba, a dì 5 Dec., in Sanuto. “Non si sa certo se 'l pontefice sia morto di veneno. Fu aperto. Maistro Ferando judica sia stato venenato: alcuno de li altri no: è di questa opinione Mastro Severino, che lo vide aprire, dice che non è venenato.” [It is not certainly known whether the pope died of poison or not. He was opened. Master Ferando judged that he was poisoned, others thought not. Of this last opinion is Master Severino, who saw him opened, and says he was not poisoned.]

³ Capitoli di una lettera scritta a Roma, 21 Dec. 1521. “Concludo che non è morto mai papa cum peggior fama dapoi è la chiesa di Dio.” [I judge there never died a pope in worse repute since the church of God had existence.]

The conclave lasted long:—"Sirs," said the Cardinal de' Medici, whom the return of the enemies of his house to Urbino and Perugia filled with alarm, and who feared for Florence itself,—“Sirs, I perceive that of us who are here assembled, no one can become pope. I have proposed to you three or four, but you have rejected them all. Neither can I accept those whom you propose; we must seek a pope among those who are not present.” Assenting to this, the cardinals asked who it was that he had in view: “Take,” said he, “the cardinal of Tortosa, an aged venerable man, who is universally esteemed a saint.”¹ This was Adrian of Utrecht, formerly a professor at Louvain; ² he had been tutor to Charles V, who from personal attachment had given him the office of a governor, and promoted his elevation to the dignity of cardinal. Cardinal Cajetan, although not of the Medicean party, rose to speak in praise of the candidate proposed. Who could have believed that the cardinals, ever accustomed to consult their personal interests in the choice of a pope, would agree to select an absent Netherlander, with whom no one could make conditions for his own private advantage? They suffered themselves to be surprised into this determination, and when the affair was concluded, they could not themselves account for the decision they had arrived at. “They were well nigh dead with fright,” says one of our authorities. They are also said to have persuaded themselves that Adrian would not accept the dignity. Pasquin amused himself at their expense, representing the pope elect as a schoolmaster, and the cardinals as schoolboys whom he was chastising.

On a worthier man, however, the choice of the conclave could scarcely have fallen. The reputation of Adrian was without a blemish; laborious, upright, and pious, he was of so earnest a gravity, that a faint smile was his nearest approach to mirth, yet benevolent withal, full of pure intentions, a true servant of religion.³ What a contrast when he entered that city wherein Leo had held his court with so lavish a splendour! There is a letter of his extant in which he declares that he would rather serve God in his priory at Louvain, than be pope.¹ And his life in the Vatican was in fact the counterpart of what he had led as professor at Louvain. It is characteristic of the man, and we may be permitted to relate the circumstance, that he brought his old house-keeper from his priory to his palace, where she continued to provide for his domestic wants as before. Nor did he make any alteration in his personal habits. He rose with the earliest dawn, said mass, and then proceeded in the usual order to his business and studies, which were interrupted only by the most frugal meal. He cannot be said to have remained a stranger to the general culture or acquirements of his age: he loved Flemish art, and prized the learning that was adorned with a tinge of eloquence. Erasmus acknowledges that he was especially protected by the pope from the attacks of bigoted schoolmen.² But he disapproved the almost heathenish character which modes of thought had assumed at Rome in his day; and as to poets, he would not even hear them named. No one could be more earnest than was Adrian VI (he chose to retain his original designation) in his desire to ameliorate the grievous condition into which Christendom had fallen at his accession.

¹ Lettera di Roma a dì 19 Zener., in Sanuto. “Medici, dubitando de li casi suoi, se la cosa fosse troppo ita in lungo deliberò mettere conclusione, et havendo in animo questo c^o. Dertusense per esser imperialissimo, disse,” &c.

² It is thus that he calls himself in a letter of 1514, to be found in Casper Burmann, Adrianus VI sive analecta historica de Adriano VI., p. 443. In documents belonging to his native country, he is called “Master Aryan Florisse of Utrecht.” Modern writers sometimes call him Boyens, because his father signs himself Floris Boyens; but this means no other than Bodewin’s son, and is not a family name. See Burmann, in the notes to Moringi Vita Adriani, p. 2.

³ Litterae ex Victoriali directivae ad Cardinalem de Flisco, in the 33rd volume of Sanuto, describes him in the terms following: “Vir est sui tenax; in concedendo parcissimus; in recipiendo nullus aut rarissimus. In sacrificio quotidianus et matutinus est. Quem amet aut si quem amet nulli exploratum. Ira non agitur, joci non ducitur; neque ob pontificatum visus est exultasse: quin constat graviter illum ad ejus famam nuntii ingemuisse.” In the collection of Burmann, will

The progress of the Turkish arms, with the fall of Belgrade and of Rhodes, furnished a new impulse to his anxiety for the re-establishment of peace among the Christian powers. Although he had been preceptor to the emperor, he yet assumed an entirely neutral position. The imperial ambassador who had hoped, on the new outbreak of war, that be found an "Itinerarium Adriani," by Ortiz, who accompanied the pope and knew him intimately. He declares (p. 223) that he never observed anything in him deserving censure; he was a mirror of all the virtues.

¹ To Florenz Oem Wyngaerden: Vittoria, 15 Feb. 1522. See Burmann, p. 398.

² Erasmus says of him in one of his letters: "Licet scholasticis disciplinis faveret, satis tamen aequus in bonas literas." Burm. p. 15. Jovius relates with complacency the progress that his reputation as a "scriptor annalium valde elegans" had caused him to make with Adrian, especially as he was no poet.

he should move the pontiff to declare for his late pupil, was compelled to leave Rome without accomplishing his purpose.¹ When the news of the conquest of Rhodes was read to the pope, he bent his eyes to the ground, said not a word, and sighed deeply.² The danger of Hungary was manifest; nor was he altogether free from apprehension respecting Italy or Rome itself. His utmost efforts were directed, to the procuring, if not peace, at least a suspension of hostilities for three years; during which time preparations might be made for a general expedition against the Turks.

Equally was he determined to anticipate the demands of the Germans, with regard to the abuses that had made their way into the Church. His avowal that such existed was most explicit. "We know," he observes in the Instructions for the Nuncio Chiericato, whom he sent to the diet, "We know that for a considerable period many abominable things have found place beside the holy throne;—abuses in spiritual matters—exorbitant straining of prerogatives—evil everywhere. From the head the malady has proceeded to the limbs; from the pope it has extended to the prelates; we are all gone astray, there is none that hath done rightly, no not one." On his part he proceeds to promise all that may be expected from a good pope: he will promote the learned and upright, repress abuses, and, if not all at once, yet gradually, bring about a reformation both in the head and members, such as men have so long desired and demanded.³

But to reform the world is not so light a task; the good intentions of an individual, however high his station, can do but little towards such a consummation. Too deeply do abuses strike their roots; with life itself they grow up and become entwined; so that it is at length difficult to eradicate the one without endangering the other.

The fall of Rhodes was far from inclining the French to make peace. On the contrary, perceiving that this loss would give the emperor new occupation, they resolved on more vigorous measures against him. They established a connection in Sicily (not without the privity of the very cardinal in whom Adrian most confided), and made a descent on that island. The pope was at length constrained to form an alliance with the emperor, which was, in fact, directed against France.

¹ Gradenigo, Relatione, quotes the viceroy of Naples. Girolamo Negro (some interesting letters from whom respecting this period we find in the Lettere di Principi, t. i.) says, p. 109, of John Manuel: "Se partì mezo disperato" [he went away half despairing].

² Negro, from the narration of the Venetian secretary, p. 110.

³ Instructio pro te Francisco Chiericato, &c. &c., to be found, amongst other writers, in Rainaldus, tom. xi. p. 363.

The Germans, again, were not now to be conciliated by what would once have been hailed as a reformation of head and members; and even had they been, how difficult, how almost impracticable, would such reform have been found!

If the pope attempted to reduce those revenues of the Curia in which he detected an appearance of simony, he could not do so without alienating the legitimate rights of those persons whose offices were founded on these revenues; offices that, for the most part, had been purchased by the men who held them.

If he contemplated a change in the dispensations of marriage, or some relaxation of existing prohibitions, it was instantly represented to him, that such a step would infringe upon and weaken the discipline of the Church.

To abate the crying abuse of indulgences, he would gladly have revived the ancient penances; but the Penitenziaria at once called his attention to the danger he would thus incur; for, while he sought to secure Germany, Italy would be lost!¹

Enough is said to shew that the pope could make no step towards reform, without seeing himself assailed by a thousand difficulties.

In addition to all this came the fact that in Rome Adrian was a stranger, by birth, nation, and the habits of his life, to the element in which he was called on to act; this he could not master, because it was not familiar to him; he did not comprehend the concealed impulses of its existence. He had been welcomed joyfully, for people told each other that he had some 5,000 vacant benefices to bestow, and all were willing to hope for a share. But never did a pope shew himself more reserved in this particular. Adrian would insist on knowing to whom it was that he gave appointments, and intrusted with offices. He proceeded with scrupulous conscientiousness,¹ and disappointed innumerable expectations. By the first decree of his pontificate he abolished the reversionary rights formerly annexed to ecclesiastical dignities; even those which had already been conceded, he revoked. The publication of this edict in Rome could not fail to bring a crowd of enemies against him. Up to his time, a certain freedom of speech and of writing had been suffered to prevail in the Roman court: this he would no longer tolerate. The exhausted state of the papal exchequer, and the numerous demands on it, obliged him to impose new taxes. This was considered intolerable on the part of one who expended so sparingly. Whatever he did was unpopular and disapproved.² He felt this deeply, and it reacted on his character. He confided less than ever in the Italians. The two Netherlanders, Enkefort, his datary, and the secretary, Hezius, to whom a certain authority was intrusted, were conversant neither with business nor the court: he found it impossible to direct them himself, neither would he resign his habits of study; not contenting himself with reading only, but choosing to write also. He was by no means easy of access; business was procrastinated, tediously prolonged, and unskilfully handled.

¹ In the first book of the Historia de Concilio Tridentino, by P. Sarpi, ed. of 1629, there is a good exposition of this state of things, extracted from a diary of Chiericato.

Thus it came to pass that in affairs of vital importance to the general interest, nothing effectual was accomplished. Hostilities were renewed in Upper Italy; Luther was more than ever active in Germany; and in Rome, which was, besides, afflicted with the plague, a general discontent prevailed.

¹ Ortiz Itinerarium, c. 28, c. 39, particularly worthy of credit; as he says, "cum provisiones et alia hujusmodi testis oculatus inspexerim."

² Lettere di Negro.—Capitolo del Berni:

"E quando un segue il libero costume
Di sfogarsi scrivendo e di cantare,
Lo minaccia di far buttare in fiume."

[And when any one follows the free custom of indulging his feelings in writing or in song, he threatens to have him tossed into the river.]

Adrian once said: "How much depends on the times in which even the best of men are cast!" The painful sense he entertained of his difficult position is eloquently expressed in this sorrowing outburst. Most appropriately was it engraven on his monument in the German church at Rome.

And here it becomes obvious, that not to Adrian personally must it be solely attributed, if his times were so unproductive in results. The papacy was encompassed by a host of conflicting claimants—urgent and overwhelming difficulties that would have furnished infinite occupation, even to a man more familiar with the medium of action, better versed in men and more fertile in expedients than Adrian VI.

Among all the cardinals, there was no one who seemed so peculiarly fitted to administer the government successfully—no one who appeared so well prepared to support the weight of the popedom,—as Giulio de' Medici. He had already managed a large share of the public business under Leo—the whole of the details were in his hands; and, even under Adrian, he had maintained a certain degree of influence.¹ This time he did not permit the supreme dignity to escape him, and ascended the papal throne under the name of Clement VII.

The faults and mistakes of his immediate predecessors were carefully avoided by the new pope. The instability, prodigality, and pleasure-seeking habits of Leo, and that ceaseless conflict with the tastes and opinions of his court into which Adrian had suffered himself to be drawn, were all eschewed by Clement VII. Every thing was arranged with the utmost discretion, and his own conduct was remarkable for the blameless rectitude and moderation of its tenor.² The pontifical ceremonies were performed with due care. Audience was given from early morning to night, with untiring assiduity. Science and the arts were encouraged in that direction towards which they had now become decidedly bent. Clement was himself a man of extensive information. He spoke with equal knowledge of his subject, whether that were philosophy and theology, or mechanics and hydraulic architecture. In all affairs he displayed extraordinary acuteness; the most perplexing questions were unravelled, the most difficult circumstances penetrated to the very bottom by his extreme sagacity. No man could debate a point with more address: under Leo, he had already manifested a prudence in counsel, and a circumspect ability in practice that none could surpass.

¹ The Relatione di Marco Foscari reports of him, with reference to those times: "Stava con grandissima reputazione e governava il papato, e havia piu zente alla sua audientia che il papa." [He lived in excellent repute; it was he who governed the papacy, and he had more people at his audiences than the pope himself.]

² Vettori says, for the last hundred years there has not been so good a man pope: "non superbo, non simoniaco, non avaro, non litidinoso, sobrio nel victo, parco nel vestire, religioso, devoto."

But it is in the storm that the pilot proves his skill. Clement entered on the duties of the pontificate—if we consider it merely as an Italian sovereignty—at a moment of most critical import.

The Spaniards had contributed more than any other power to extend and uphold the states of the Church; they had re-established the Medici in Florence. Thus leagued with the popes, their own advancement in Italy had kept pace with that of the house of Medici. Alexander VI had made a way for them into Lower Italy, Julius had given them access to the central regions, and their attack on Milan, undertaken in alliance with Leo X, had made them masters of Upper Italy. Clement himself had frequently afforded them powerful aid. There is still extant an instruction from him to one of his ambassadors at the court of Spain, wherein he enumerates the services he had rendered to Charles V and his house. It was principally attributable to his efforts that Francis I did not press forward to Naples at his first arrival in Italy. He had prevented Leo from throwing impediments in the way of Charles's election to the imperial crown, and had induced him to repeal the old constitution by which it was enacted that no king of Naples could at the same time be emperor. Unmoved by the promises of the French, he had given his best support to the alliance of Leo with Charles for the recovery of Milan; and to favour this undertaking, he spared neither his own person nor the resources of his country and adherents. It was he who procured the election of Adrian; and at the time when this was done, it seemed nearly equivalent to making Charles himself pope.¹ I will not inquire how much of Leo's policy was due to the counsellor and how much to the pontiff himself; but thus much is certain, that Cardinal de' Medici was always on the side of the emperor. Even after he had become pope, the imperial troops were furnished by him with money, provisions, and grants of ecclesiastical revenues. Once again they were partially indebted to his support for their victory.

Thus intimately was Clement connected with the Spaniards, but, as not unfrequently happens, this alliance was the cause of extraordinary evils.

The popes had contributed to the rise of the Spanish powers; but that rise had never been the result they had sought. They had wrested Milan from the French, but not with the purpose of transferring it to Spain. There had even been more than one war carried on to prevent Milan and Naples from falling into the hands of one and the same possessor.² The fact that the Spaniards, so long masters of Lower Italy, should be now daily obtaining firmer footing in Lombardy, and that of their delaying the investiture of Sforza, were regarded in Rome with the utmost impatience and displeasure.

Clement was also personally dissatisfied. It may be perceived from the instructions before cited, that even as cardinal he had not always thought himself treated with the consideration due to his merits and services. He did not even now meet with the deference that he felt to be his right; and the expedition against Marseilles in the year 1524 was undertaken in direct opposition to his advice. His ministers, as they declared themselves, expected still further marks of disrespect towards the apostolic

¹ Istruttione al Card. reverend^{mo} di Farnese, che fu poi Paulo III, quando andò legato all' Imperatore Carlo V, doppo il sacco di Roma. (App. No. 15.)

² It is expressly stated in the before-mentioned instructions, that the pope had displayed a readiness to acquiesce even in what displeased him; "purche lo stato di Milano restasse al duca, al quale effetto si erano fatte tutte le guerre d' Italia." [To the effect that the state of Milan should remain in possession of the duke, a thing which had been the object of all the Italian wars.]

see, perceiving nothing in the Spaniards but imperious insolence.¹

How closely had the by-gone course of events, and his personal position, bound Clement both by necessity and inclination to the Spanish cause, yet how many were the reasons that now presented themselves, all tending to make him execrate the power he had so largely contributed to establish, and place himself in opposition to the cause for which he had hitherto so zealously laboured !

There is, perhaps, no effort in politics so difficult to make as that of retracing the path we have hitherto trodden—of recalling that chain of sequences which we ourselves have elicited.

And how much was now depending on such an effort ! The Italians were profoundly sensible of the fact, that the acts of the present moment would decide their fate for centuries. A powerful community of feeling had taken rise and prevailed throughout the nation. I am fully persuaded that this may be in great part ascribed to the literary and artistic progress of Italy,—a progress in which it left other nations so far behind. The arrogance and rapacity of the Spaniards, alike leaders as soldiers, were, besides, intolerable to all ; and it was with contempt and rage combined that the Italians beheld this horde of half-barbarous foreigners masters in their country. Matters were still in such a position that they might yet free themselves from these intruders : but the truth must not be disguised. If the attempt were not made with the whole force of the nation's power, if they were now defeated, they were lost for ever.

I could have desired to set forth the complicated events of this period in their fullest development—to exhibit the whole contest of the excited powers in its minutest detail ; but I can here follow a few of the more important movements only.

The first attempt made, and one that seemed particularly well devised, was that of gaining over the best general of the emperor to the Roman side. It was known that he was greatly dissatisfied, and if, together with him, that army by means of which Charles mastered Italy could also be won, as was confidently hoped, what more could be required? There was no dearth of promises, by way of inducement,—even that of a crown was included amongst them; but how grievously had they miscalculated, how instantly were the delicate complications of their astute prudence shivered to atoms against the rugged materials to which it was applied! This General Pescara was an Italian born, but of Spanish race; he spoke only Spanish, he would be nothing but a Spaniard; for the elegant cultivation of the Italians he had neither taste nor aptitude; the best furniture of his mind had been drawn from Spanish romances, and these breathe, above all, of loyalty and fidelity. His very nature was opposed to a national enterprise in favour of Italy.¹ No sooner had he received the Italian overtures than they were communicated, not to his comrades alone, but even to the emperor; he used them only to discover the purposes of the Italians, and to frustrate all their plans.

¹ M. Giberto datario a Don Michele di Silva. Lettere di Principi, i. 197, b.

But these very overtures made a deadly strife with the emperor unavoidable; for how was it possible that the mutual confidence of the parties should fail to be utterly destroyed?

In the summer of 1526, we at length see the Italians putting their own hands to the work, and that with all their might. The Milanese are already in arms against the imperialists, a combined Venetian and papal force advances to their support, assistance is promised from Switzerland, and treaties have been concluded with France and England. "This time," says Giberto, the most trusted minister of Clement VII, "the question is not of some petty vengeance, some point of honour, or a single town; this war is to decide whether Italy shall be free, or is doomed to perpetual thralldom." He had no doubt of the result—he was persuaded that it would be a fortunate one. "Posterity will envy us," he declares, "for having lived at such a moment; for having witnessed and had our share in so much good fortune." His hope is, that no foreign aid will be required. "The glory will be all our own; and so much the sweeter will be the fruit."¹

¹ Vettori has pronounced over him the least enviable eulogy imaginable; here it is: "Era superbo oltre modo, invidioso, ingrato, avaro, venenoso e crudele, senza religione, senza umanità, nato proprio per distruggere l'Italia." Morone also declares to Guicciardini, that there was no man more faithless and malicious than Pescara (Hist. d'Italia, xvi. 476); and yet the proposal above described was made to him! I do not cite these opinions as believing them true, but simply because they prove that Pescara had shewn no feeling towards the Italians but hatred and enmity.

It was with thoughts and hopes such as these, that Clement undertook his war with Spain;² it was his boldest and most magnanimous project, but also his most unfortunate and ruinous one.

The affairs of the Church were inextricably interwoven with those of the State, yet Clement would seem to have left the commotions of Germany entirely out of consideration; it was, nevertheless, in these that the first reaction became manifest.

In July, 1526, that moment when the papal forces were advancing towards Northern Italy, the diet had assembled at Spires, with the purpose of arriving at some definite resolution in regard to the disorders of the Church. It was not in the nature of things that the imperial party, or Ferdinand of Austria, who represented the emperor, and who had himself the hope of possessing Milan, should be very earnest in the maintenance of the papal influence north of the Alps, when they were themselves attacked by the pope, with so much determination, on their southern side. Whatever intentions might have been earlier formed or announced by the imperial court,³ the open war now entered on by the pope against the emperor would assuredly put an end to all considerations in favour of the former. Never had the towns expressed themselves more freely, never had the princes pressed more urgently for the removal of their burdens. It was proposed that the books containing the new regulations should be burnt forthwith, and that the holy scriptures should be taken as the sole rule of faith. Although some opposition was made, yet never was a more independent or more decisive resolution adopted. Ferdinand signed a decree of the Empire, whereby the states were declared free to comport themselves in matters of religion as each should best answer it to God and the emperor, that is, according to its own judgment. In this resolution, no reference whatever was made to the pope, and it may fairly be regarded as the commencement of the true reformation, and the establishment of a new church in Germany. In Saxony, Hesse, and the neighbouring countries, it was practically adopted without delay. The legal existence of the Protestant party in the Empire is based on the decree of Spire, of 1526.

¹ G. M. Giberto al vescovo di Veruli. Lettere di Principi, i. p. 192, a.

² Foscai also says: "Quello fa a presente di voler far lega con Francia, fa per ben suo e d'Italia, non perchè ama Francesi." [His present wish to ally himself with France is for his own good and that of Italy, not because he has any love for the French.]

³ The instructions of the emperor, which had occasioned some alarm to the Protestants, bear the date of March, 1526, when the pope had not yet concluded his alliance with France.

It may be easily asserted that this expression of opinion in Germany was decisive for Italy also. The Italians were far from being zealous, as a nation, for their great enterprise, and even among those who desired its success, unanimity did not prevail. Able as he was, and thoroughly Italian in spirit, the pope was yet not one of those men who calmly control the current of circumstances, and seem to hold fortune enchained. His keen perception of realities seemed injurious rather than serviceable to him: his conviction that he was the weaker party was stronger than was expedient; all possible contingencies, every form of danger, presented themselves too clearly before him; they bewildered his mind and confused his decisions. There is a practical and inventive faculty by which some men intuitively perceive the simple and practicable in affairs, and, guided by this, they rapidly seize on the best expedient. This he did not possess;¹ in the most critical moments he was seen to hesitate, waver, and waste his thoughts in attempts to spare money. His allies having failed in their promises, the results he had hoped for were far from being obtained, and the imperialists still maintained their hold in Lombardy, when, in Nov. 1526, George Frundsberg crossed the Alps with a formidable body of landsknechts, to bring the contest to an end. This army was altogether Lutheran—leader and followers. They came resolved to avenge the emperor on the pope, whose secession from the alliance had been represented to them as the cause of all the evils so generally felt and complained of. The wars so long continued through Christendom, and the successes of the Ottomans, who were pouring their troops over Hungary, all were attributed to the faithlessness of Clement. "When once I make my way to Rome," said Frundsberg, "I will hang the pope."

¹ Suriano, Rel. di 1533, finds in him "core frigidissimo; el quale fa le Beat^{me}. S. esser dotata di non vulgar timidità, non dire pusillanimità. Il che però parmi avere trovato comunemente in la natura fiorentina. Questa timidità causa che S. Sà. è molto irresoluta." [A very cold heart, which causes his holiness to be endowed with no common timidity—for I will not say cowardice—but I think I have noticed that frequently in the Florentine character. This timidity makes his holiness very irresolute.]

With anxious thought is the storm seen to gather in the narrowing and lowering horizon. Rome, loaded perhaps with vices, yet not the less teeming with the noblest effort, the most exalted intellect, the richest culture; powerfully creative, adorned with matchless works of art, such as the world has never since produced; replete with riches, ennobled by the impress of genius, and exercising a vital and imperishable influence on the whole world, this Rome is now threatened with destruction. As the masses of the imperial force drew together, the Italian troops dispersed before them, the only army that yet remained followed them from afar; the emperor had been long unable to pay his troops, and could not alter their direction even did he desire to do so. They marched beneath the imperial banner, guided only by their own stormy will and impulse. Clement still hoped, negotiated, offered concessions, retracted them; but the sole expedient that could have saved him—the contenting these hordes, namely, with all the money they may find the boldness to demand—this, he either could not, or would not adopt. Will he then at least make a stand against the enemy with such weapons as he has? Four thousand men would have sufficed to secure the passes of Tuscany, but the attempt was not even thought of. Rome contained within her walls some thirty thousand inhabitants capable of bearing arms ; many of these men had seen service ; they wore swords by their sides, which they used freely in their broils among each other, and then boasted of their exploits. But to oppose the enemy, who brought with him certain destruction, five hundred men were the utmost that could ever be mustered without the city. At the first onset the pope and his forces were overthrown. On the 6th of May, 1527, two hours before sunset, the imperialists poured their unbridled numbers into Rome. Their former general, Frundsberg, was no longer at their head ; in a disturbance among his troops he had been unable to repress them as was his wont, and, being struck by apoplexy, remained behind in a state of dangerous illness. Bourbon, who had led the army so far, was killed at the first fixing of the scaling-ladders. Thus, restrained by no leader, the blood-thirsty soldiery, hardened by long privations and rendered savage by their trade, burst over the devoted city. Never fell richer booty into more violent hands, never was plunder more continuous or more destructive.¹ How vivid a lustre was cast over the beginning of the sixteenth century by the splendour of Rome ; it designates a period most influential on the development of the human mind. This day saw the light of that splendour extinguished for ever.

And thus did the pontiff, who had hoped to effect the liberation of Italy, find himself besieged, and as it were a prisoner, in the castle of St. Angelo ; by this great reverse the preponderance of the Spaniards in Italy was irrevocably established.

A new expedition undertaken by the French, and promising great results in its commencement, was a total failure. They were compelled to give up all their claims upon Italy.

No less important was another occurrence : before Rome was yet captured, when it was merely seen that the march of Bourbon was in that direction, the enemies of the Medici in ¹ Vettori : "La uccisione non fu molta, perchè rari si uccidono quelli che non si vogliono difendere ; ma la preda fu incestimabile in danari contanti, di gioie d'oro e d'argento lavorato, di vestiti, d'arazzi, paramenti di casa, mercantie d'ogni sorte e di taglie." He does not blame the pope, but the inhabitants, for this misfortune ; he describes them as "superbi, avari, homicidi, invidiosi, libidinosi e simulatori." Such a population could not sustain itself.

Florence had availed themselves of the confusion of the moment, and once more expelled the family of the pope. The revolt of his native city was more painful to Clement than even the downfall of Rome. With astonishment did men behold him, after so many indignities, again connect himself with the imperialists. He did so because he saw that with the help of the Spaniards alone could his kindred and party be reinstated in Florence; this he would secure at all hazards; the domination of the emperor was at least more endurable to Clement than the disobedience of his rebels. In proportion as the fortunes of the French were seen to decline, did the pope make approaches to the Spaniards; and when the first were at length entirely defeated, he concluded the treaty of Barcelona with the latter. He so completely changed his policy, that the very army by which Rome had been sacked before his eyes, and himself so long held captive, was now called to his assistance; recruited and strengthened, it was led to the reduction of his native city.

Thenceforth Charles was more powerful in Italy than any emperor had been for many centuries. The crown that he had received at Bologna had now regained its full significance; Milan gradually became as entirely subjected to his authority as was Naples. His restoration of the Medici to their seat in Florence secured him a direct and permanent influence in Tuscany. The remaining states of Italy either sought his alliance or submitted to his power. With the strength of Germany and Spain united, by the force of his victorious arms, and in right of his imperial dignity, he held all Italy in subjection, from the Alps to the sea.

To this point it was then that the Italian wars conducted the country; from that period she has never been freed from the rule of the stranger. Let us now examine the progress of the religious dissensions that were so intimately entwined with the political events.

If the pope acquiesced in the establishment of Spanish supremacy in all directions, he had at least the hope that this powerful emperor, who was described to him as devoted to Catholicism, would in all cases assist to re-establish the papal dominion in Germany. There is even a stipulation to that effect in the treaty of Barcelona. The emperor promised to lend his utmost efforts for the reduction of Protestantism, and did indeed seem bent on accomplishing that purpose. To the Protestant delegates who waited on him in Italy he returned a most discouraging reply, and on his progress into Germany (1530) certain members of the Curia, and more especially Cardinal Campeggio, who accompanied him as legate, proposed extreme measures, infinitely dangerous to the peace of Germany.

There is still extant a memorial from the cardinal to the emperor, presented during the sitting of the diet at Augsburg, in which these projects are set forth. I allude to this with extreme reluctance, but, in deference to the truth, I must say a few words respecting it.

Cardinal Campeggio does not content himself with deploring the disorders in religion, but insists more particularly on the political evils resulting from them; he points to the decadence of power among the nobles in all the cities of the Empire, as one of the consequences of the Reformation. He declares that neither ecclesiastical nor secular princes can any longer obtain the obedience due to them, so that even the majesty of the Caesar has come to be no longer regarded! He then proceeds to shew how this evil may be remedied.

The mystery of his curative system was not very profound. It was only necessary, according to him, that the emperor should form a compact with the well-affected princes, whereupon attempts should be made to convert the disaffected, either by promises or threats. But suppose these last to be recusant—what was next to be done? The right would then exist of “rooting out these pestilential weeds by fire and sword.”¹

The first step in this process would be to confiscate property, civil or ecclesiastical, in Germany as well as in Hungary and Bohemia. For, with regard to heretics, this is lawful and right. Is the mastery over them thus obtained, then must holy inquisitors be appointed, who shall trace out every remnant of them, proceeding against them as the Spaniards did against the Moors in Spain." The university of Wittenberg was furthermore to be placed under ban, all who studied there being declared unworthy of favour, whether from pope or emperor. The books of the heretics were also to be burnt, the monks who had abandoned their convents were to be sent back to them, and no heretic was to be tolerated at any court. But first of all unsparing confiscation was necessary. "And even though your majesty," says the legate, "should deal only with the heads of the party, you may derive a large sum of money from them, and this is indispensable, in any case, for proceeding against the Turks."

¹ Se alcuni ve ne fossero, che dio nol voglia, li quali obstinatamente perseverassero in questa diabolica via, quella (S. M.) potrà mettere la mano al ferro et al foco, et radicitus extirpare questa mala vnenosa pianta.

Such are the main propositions, and such is the tone of this project:¹ how does every word breathe of oppression, carnage, and rapine! We cannot wonder that the very worst should be apprehended by the Germans from an emperor who came among them surrounded by such counsellors, nor that the Protestants should take counsel together as to the degree of resistance they might lawfully oppose to such measures in their own self-defence.

Happily, however, as affairs stood, an attempt at such proceedings as those recommended by the legate was not greatly to be feared.

The emperor was by no means sufficiently powerful to carry out this proposal: a fact that Erasmus demonstrated very clearly at the time.

But even had he possessed the power, he would scarcely have found the will to do it.

Charles was by nature rather kind, considerate, thoughtful, and averse to precipitation, than the contrary: the more closely he examined these heresies, the more did he find in them a certain accordance with thoughts that had arisen in his own mind. The tone of his proclamation for a diet gives evidence of a desire to hear the different opinions, to judge of them, and seek to bring all to the standard of Christian truth. Very far removed was this disposition from the violence of purpose intimated by the legate.

¹ Such a project did they venture to call an instruction. Instructio data Caesari a reverend^{mo}. Campeggio in dieta Augustana, 1530. I found it in a Roman library, in the handwriting of the time, and beyond all doubt authentic.

Even those whose system it is to doubt the purity of human intentions, will find one reason unanswerable : it was not for the interest of Charles to adopt coercive measures.

Was he, the emperor, to make himself the executor of the papal decrees? Should he set himself to subdue those enemies of the pope—and not his only, but those of all succeeding pontiffs—who furnished them with so much occupation? The friendly dispositions of the papal see were by no means so well assured as to awaken a confidence that could induce him to this.

Rather it was his obvious interest that things should remain as they were for the moment, since they offered him an advantage, unsought on his part, but which he had only to seize in order to attain a higher supremacy than he even now enjoyed.

It was generally believed, whether justly or not I will not inquire, that a general council of the church alone could avail for the settlement of differences so important, the removal of errors so fatal. Church councils had maintained their credit precisely because a very natural repugnance to them had been evinced by the popes, and all opposition to them by the papal chair had tended to raise them in public estimation. In the year 1530, Charles applied his thoughts seriously to this matter, and promised to call a council within a brief specified period.

In the different complications of their interests with those of the pontificate, the princes had ever desired to find some spiritual restraint for the church. Charles might thus assure himself of most zealous allies in a council assembled under existing circumstances. Convened at his instigation, it would be held under his influence ; and to him also would revert the execution of its edicts. These decrees would have to bear upon two important questions,—they would affect the pope equally with his opponents, the old idea of a reformation in head and members would be realised, and how decided a predominance would all this secure to the temporal power,—above all, to Charles himself!

This mode of proceeding was most judicious; it was, if you will have it so, inevitable, but it was, at the same time, for the best interest of the emperor.

On the other hand, no event could be better calculated to awaken anxiety in the pontiff and his court. I find that at the first serious mention of a council, the price of all the saleable offices of the court declined considerably.¹ The danger threatened by a council to the existing state of things is obvious from this fact.

In addition to this, Clement VII had personal motives for objecting to the measure: he was not of legitimate birth, neither had he risen to the supreme dignity by means that were altogether blameless: again, he had been determined by considerations entirely personal, to employ the resources of the Church in a contest with his native city; and for all these things a pope might fairly expect heavy reckoning with a council. Thus it inspired him with a deadly terror, and Suriano tells us that he would not willingly utter its very name.

He did not reject the proposal in terms; this he could not do with any regard to the honour of the papal see; but we can easily conceive the reluctance of heart with which he would receive it.

He submitted, without doubt—he was entirely compliant; but he did not fail to set forth the objections existing to the measure, and that in the most persuasive forms. He represented all the dangers and difficulties inseparable from a council, declaring its consequences to be of a very doubtful nature.² Next he stipulated for the concurrence of all other princes, as well as for a previous subjection of the

¹ Lettera anonima all' arcivescovo Pimpinello (Lettere di Principi, iii. 5). "Gli ufficii solo con la fama del concilio sono inviliti tanto che non se ne trovano danari." I see that Pallavicini also quotes this letter, iii. 7, 1. I do not know on what authority he ascribes it to Sanga.

² For example: All' imperatore, di man propria di papa Clemente (Lettere di Principi, ii. 197). "Al contrario nessun (rimedio) è piu pericoloso e per partorir maggiori mali (del concilio), quando non concorrono le debite circostanze." [On the contrary, no remedy can be more dangerous, or produce greater evils (than the council), if the proper circumstances do not occur.]

Protestants,—demands that were perfectly in accordance with the papal system and doctrine, but utterly impracticable in the existing state of things. But how could it be expected from him that, within the limit of time assigned by the emperor, he should proceed, not apparently only, but in earnest and with resolution, to promote a work so likely to injure himself? Charles often reproached him with his backwardness, ascribing to it all the mischief that afterwards ensued. He, doubtless, still hoped to evade the necessity that hung over him.

But it clung to him fast and firmly : when Charles returned to Italy in 1533, still impressed with what he had seen and heard in Germany, he pressed the pope in person during a conference held at Bologna, and with increased earnestness, on the subject of the council, which he had so frequently demanded in writing. Their opinions were thus brought into direct collision,—the pope held fast by his conditions, the emperor declared their fulfilment impossible,—they could come to no agreement. In the documents respecting these matters that remain to us, a sort of discrepancy is perceptible,—the pope appearing less averse from the emperor's wishes in some than in others ; however this may be, he had no alternative,—a fresh proclamation¹ must be issued. He could not so effectually blind himself as not to perceive that when the emperor, who was gone to Spain, should return, mere words would be insufficient to content him,—that the danger he dreaded, and with which a council summoned under such circumstances certainly did menace the Roman see, could then be no longer averted.

¹ Respecting the negotiations at Bologna, valuable information, derived from the archives of the Vatican, may be found in one of the best chapters of Pallavicini, lib. iii. c. 12. He names the variation alluded to in the text, and says, it rested on explicit discussion ; and, in effect, we find in the despatches to the Catholic states in Rainaldus, xx. 659, Hortleder, i. xv., the stipulation for a general concurrence repeated ; the pope promises to communicate the results of his efforts. Among the points proposed for the consideration of the Protestants, it is said expressly in the 7th article : "Quod si forsitan aliqui principes velint tam pio negotio deesse, nihilominus summus D^s. n^r. procedet cum saniori parte consentiente." This would seem to be the discrepancy that Pallavicini had in view, although he mentions another point of difference.

The situation was one in which the possessor of a power, of whatever kind, might well be excused for resorting even to extreme measures, if these were the only means that could insure his own safety. The political preponderance of the emperor was already excessive, and if the pope had resigned himself to this state of things, he could not but feel his own depressed condition. In arranging the long-standing disputes of the Church with Ferrara, Charles V had decided for the latter; this mortified the pontiff deeply, and though he acquiesced in the decision, he complained of it among those of his own circle. How much more afflicting was it now, then, when this monarch, from whom he had hoped the immediate subjugation of the Protestants, was preferring his claim, under pretext of religious dissension, to an amount of predominance in ecclesiastical affairs, such as no emperor had enjoyed for centuries; nay, when he was proceeding without scruple to acts that must compromise the spiritual authority and dignity of the holy see. Must Clement indeed endure to see himself sink utterly into the emperor's hands, and be wholly given up to his tender mercies?

His resolution was taken even whilst in Bologna. More than once Francis had proposed to cement his political alliances with Clement by means of a family connection. This the pontiff had hitherto declined—in the desperate position of his present affairs, he recurred to it as a ground of hope. It is expressly affirmed that the real cause of Clement's once again lending an ear to the French king was the demand of Charles for a council.¹

¹ Suriano, Relatione, 1535. "Il papa andò a Bologna contra sua voglia e quasi sforzato, come di buon logo ho inteso, e fu assai di ciò evidente segno, che S. S^a. consumò di giorni cento in tale viaggio, il quale potea far in sei dì. Considerando dunque Clemente questi tali casi suoi, e per dire così la servitù nella quale egli si trovava per la materia del concilio, la quale Cesare non lasciava di stimolare, cominciò a rendersi più facile al Christianissimo. E quivi si trattò l'andata di Marsilia, et insieme la pratica del matrimonio, essendo già la nipote nobile et habile." [The pope went to Bologna against his will, and, as it were, by compulsion, as I have heard from good authority; and an evident sign of this was, that his holiness consumed a hundred days in that journey which he might have made in six. Clement then, considering this state of his affairs, and the servitude, so to speak, in which he was placed by the affair of the council, which the emperor

The pope would most probably never again have attempted, from purely political motives, to establish an equilibrium of power between these two great monarchs, and to divide his favour equally between them ; but it was on this course that he now determined, in consideration of the dangers threatening the Church.

Another meeting between Francis and the pope was arranged, and took place in Marseilles, where the closest alliance was agreed upon. Precisely as Clement had confirmed his friendship with the emperor, during the Florentine difficulties, by accepting a natural daughter of Charles as wife to one of his nephews, so did he now cement the bond which the embarrassments of the Church compelled him to form with Francis, by the betrothal of his young niece, Catherine de' Medici, to the king's second son : in the first instance, it was against the French, and their indirect influence on Florence that he sought to defend himself ; on this occasion, the emperor and his intentions with regard to a council were the cause of fear.

He now took no further pains to conceal his purpose. We have a letter addressed by him to Ferdinand I, wherein he declares that his efforts to procure the concurrence of the Christian princes to the assembling of a council had been without effect. King Francis I, to whom he had spoken, thought the present moment unfavourable for such a purpose, and refused to adopt the suggestion, but he (Clement) still hoped at some other opportunity to obtain a more favourable decision from the Christian sovereigns.¹ I cannot comprehend the doubt that has existed in regard to the real intentions of the pope. It was but in his last communication with the Catholic princes of Germany, that he had repeated his demand for universal concurrence as a condition to the proposed council. Is not his present declaration, that he cannot bring about this general agreement, equivalent to the positive would not cease to urge, began to be more compliant towards the most Christian king, and then was concluded the conference at Marseilles and also the marriage, the niece (Clement's) being now marriageable.] At a previous period, the pope would have alleged her birth and age as a pretext for evading the agreement.

¹ 20th of March, 1534.—Pallavicini, iii. 16, 3.

assertion that he recalls his announcement of the council? ¹ In his alliance with France, he had found alike the courage to pursue this line of conduct, and the pretext for it. I can by no means convince myself that the council ever would have been held in his pontificate.

This was not, however, the only consequence of the new league; another and a most unexpected one presently developed itself, one too of the most extensive and permanent importance, more especially as regards the Germans.

Most extraordinary was the combination that resulted from this alliance, in consequence of the peculiar complications of ecclesiastical and secular interests. Francis I was on the most friendly terms with the Protestants, and now, becoming so closely connected with the pope, he may be said, in a certain sort, to have combined the Protestants and the pontiff in one and the same system.

And here we perceive what it was that constituted the strength of that position, to which the Protestants had now attained. The emperor could have no intention of again subjecting them unconditionally to the pope, because the agitations they occasioned were absolutely needful to him for the purpose of keeping the pontiff in check. Clement, on the other hand, as it gradually became manifest, was not disposed even on his part to see their existence entirely dependent on the favour or disfavour of the emperor; it was not altogether unconsciously that the pope had become in a measure leagued with the Protestants; his hope was that he might avail himself of their opposition to Charles, and supply that monarch with occupation by their means.

It was remarked at the time that the French king had made Clement believe the principal Protestant princes dependent on himself, and that he had both the will and power to induce them to renounce the project of a council; ²

¹ Suriano: "La Ser^{ta}. Vr. dunque in materia del concilio può esser certissima, che dal canto di Clemente fu suggita con tutti li mezzi e con tutte le vie." [For the matter of the council, your serenity may then be most certain, that it was eschewed by Clement in all possible ways and by every sort of means.]

² Sarpi: Historia del Concilio Tridentino, lib. i. p. 68. An important part of what Sarpi has asserted, though not the whole, is confirmed by Suriano. This ambassador says,—"Avendo fatto credere

but if we do not greatly mistake, these engagements went much further. Soon after the meeting of Francis with the pope, another took place between the French king and the landgrave, Philip of Hesse; these sovereigns united for the restoration of the duke of Würtemberg, who had at that time been dispossessed of his estates by the house of Austria. Francis agreed to furnish supplies of money, and the landgrave effected the undertaking with astonishing rapidity in one short campaign. We have full proof that the landgrave had been instructed to make an advance on the hereditary dominions of Austria;¹ the universal opinion being that Francis was meditating to attack Milan again, and this time from the side of Germany.² A still clearer insight is afforded to us of this matter by Marino Giustiniano, at that time Venetian ambassador in France; he expressly declares that these German operations had been determined on by Clement and Francis at Marseilles: he adds further, that a descent of these troops upon Italy was by no means foreign to the plan of operations, and that secret aid was to be afforded by Clement to the enterprise.³ It would be a Clemente, che da S. M. Ch^{ma}. dipendessero quelli S.ⁱ. principalissimi e capi della fattione Luterana—si che almeno si fuggisse il concilio.” [Having made Clement believe that those princes and chiefs of the Lutheran faction depended on his most Christian majesty, so that at least he (the pope) should escape the council.] This is all that I have ventured to assert.

¹ In the Instruction to his ambassador to France, August, 1532 (Rommel, Urkundenbuch, 61), he excuses himself “that he did not go on to attack the king in his hereditary possessions.”

² Jovius, Historiae sui temporis, lib. xxxii. p. 129. Paruta, Storia Venez. p. 389.

³ Relatione del clarissimo M. Marino Giustiniano el K.^r. venuto d'ambasciator al Christianissimo re di Francia, del 1535. (Archivio Venez.) “Francesco fece l'aboccamento di Marsilia con Clemente, nel qual vedendo loro che Cesare stava fermo—conchiusero il movimento delle armi in Germania, sotto preteste di voler metter il duca di Virtemberg in casa: nel quale se Iddio non avesse posto la mano con il mezzo di Cesare, il quale all'improvviso e con gran prestezza, senza saputa del X^{mo}.; con la restitution del ducato di Virtemberg fece la pace, tutte quelle genti venivano in Italia sotto il favor secreto di Clemente.” I am of opinion that more minute information will yet be obtained on this point. Suriano has also the following:—“Di tutti li desiderii (del re) s'accommodò Clemente, con parole tali che lo facevano credere S.S. esser disposta in tutto alle sue voglie, senza però far somewhat rash to accept these assertions, however confidently made, as fully authentic ; still further proof would be required : but even though we do not accord them entire belief, there does unquestionably remain a very extraordinary phenomenon for our consideration—it is one that could never have been looked for. That the pope and the Protestants, at the very moment when each was pursuing the other with implacable hatred, when both were engaged in a religious warfare that filled the world with discord, should yet on the other hand be strictly bound together by the ties of a similar political interest !

On earlier occasions of difficulty and complication in the temporal affairs of Italy, the crooked, ambiguous, and over subtle policy of Clement had been more injurious to his interests than all his enemies, and the same dubious measures produced for him yet more bitter fruits in his ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

Threatened in his hereditary provinces, King Ferdinand hastened to conclude the peace of Kadan ; by this he abandoned Würtemberg, and even formed a close league with the landgrave himself. These were the brightest days of Philip of Hesse ; he had restored an exiled German prince to his rights by the strong hand, and this rendered him one of the most influential chiefs of the Empire. But he had secured another important result by his victory : the treaty of peace concluded in consequence, contained a momentous decision in regard to the religious dissensions—the imperial chamber of justice was directed to take cognisance of no more suits relating to confiscated church property.

I do not know that any other single event was of equal importance with this expedition of the landgrave Philip's, in the promotion of Protestant ascendancy among the Germans.

provi-one alcuna in scrittura.” That an Italian expedition was talked of cannot be denied ; the pope maintained that he had rejected the proposal—“Non avere bisogno di moto in Italia.” The king had told him that he must remain quiet, “con le mani accorte nelle maniche.” It seems probable that the French were affirming what the Italians had denied, the ambassador in France being more positive than the ambassador in Rome ; but, supposing the pope to say that he desired no movement in Italy, it is obvious how little that expression would exclude the idea of a movement in Germany,

In that direction to the imperial chamber is involved a judicial security of most extensive significance. Nor were its effects slow to follow. The peace of Kadan may be regarded, as it appears to me, as the second great epoch in the rise of a Protestant power in Germany. For a certain period the progress of Protestantism had declined in rapidity; it now began anew to extend itself, and most triumphantly: Würtemberg was reformed without delay; the German provinces of Denmark, Pomerania, the Mark of Brandenburg, the second branch of Saxony, one branch of Brunswick and the Palatinate followed. Within a few years the reformation of the Church extended through the whole of Lower Germany, and permanently established itself in Upper Germany.

And the enterprise that had conducted to all this, the undertaking by which this enormous increase of desertion from the ranks of the Church, had been brought about, was entered on with the knowledge, perhaps even with the approbation, of Pope Clement himself!

The papacy was in a position utterly false and untenable; its worldly tendencies had produced a degeneracy that had in its turn called forth opponents and adversaries innumerable. These tendencies being persisted in, the increasing complications and antagonism of temporal and ecclesiastical interests, promoted its decadence, and at length bore it wholly to the ground.

Among other misfortunes the schism of England must be attributed chiefly to this state of things.

The fact that Henry VIII, however inimical to Luther, however closely bound to the papal see, was yet disposed to threaten the popedom with ecclesiastical innovation on the first political difference, is one that well deserves remark. This occurred in relation to matters purely political, so early as the year 1525.¹ It is true that all differences were then arranged, the king made common cause with the pope against the emperor; and when Clement, shut up in the castle of

¹ Wolsey had written threats to the effect, "che ogni provincia doventarà Lutherana;" an expression in which may perhaps be perceived the first symptoms of secession from Rome shewn by the English government. (See Giberto ai nuntii d'Inghilterra. Lettere di Principi, i. 147.)

St. Angelo, was abandoned by all, Henry VIII found means to send him assistance ; from this cause the pope was perhaps more kindly disposed towards Henry personally, than towards any other sovereign.¹ But since that time the question of the king's divorce had arisen ; it is not to be denied that, even in the year 1528, the pope had allowed Henry to believe a favourable decision probable, even though he did not promise it, "when once the Germans and Spaniards should be driven out of Italy."² But so far were the imperialists from being "driven out," that they now first established themselves, as we know, in permanent possession of the land. We have seen in how strict an alliance Clement connected himself with them. Under circumstances so essentially changed, he could by no means fulfil those expectations, which, be it observed, he had warranted by a passing hint only.³ Scarcely was the peace of Barcelona concluded, than he summoned the suit for the divorce before the tribunals of Rome. The wife whom Henry desired to put away, was aunt to the emperor ; the validity of the marriage had been expressly affirmed by a former pope; it was now to be tried before the tribunals of the Curia, and these were under the immediate and perpetual influence of the emperor; was there a possibility of doubt as to the decision? Hereupon, Henry at once adopted the course that had for some time been in contemplation. In essentials, in all that regarded the dogmas of the church, he was doubtless a Catholic, and so did he remain; but this question of the divorce, which was so unreservedly treated in Rome according to political views, and with no other consideration, exasperated him to an ever increasing opposition to the pope's temporal ascendancy. To every step that was taken in Rome to his disadvantage, he replied by some measure directed against the Curia; and by giving more formal expression to his determined purpose of emancipating himself from its influence. When at last then, in the year 1534, the definitive sentence was pronounced, he no longer demurred, but declared the entire separation of his kingdom from the pope. So weak had those bonds already become, by which the Roman see was united to the several national churches, that it required only the determination of a sovereign to wrest his kingdom altogether from their influence.

¹ Contarini, Relatione di 1530, expressly affirms this. Suiano too says, 1533—"Anglia S. Santità ama et era conjunctissimo prima." [His holiness loves the English king, and was at first strictly united with him.] The design of Henry as to his divorce, he declares without ceremony to be a "pazzia" [piece of folly].

² From the despatches of Doctor Knight of Orvieto, 1st and 9th of January, 1528. Herbert's Life of Henry VIII, p. 218.

³ The whole situation of affairs is explained by the following passages from a letter by the papal secretary, Sanga, to Campeggio, dated Viterbo, 2nd Sept. 1528, at the moment when the Neapolitan enterprise had failed (a fact alluded to in the letter), and Campeggio was preparing for his journey to England :—"Come vostra Sign. Rev^{ma}. sa, tenendosi N. Signore obligatissimo come fa a quel Seren^{mo}. re, nessuna cosa è sì grande della quale non desideri compiacerli, ma bisogna ancora che sua Beatitudine, vedendo l'imperatore vittorioso e sperando in questa vittoria non trovarlo alieno della pace,—non si precipiti a dare all' imperatore causa di nuova rottura, la quale leveria in perpetuo ogni speranza di pace : oltre che al certo metteria S. S^a. a fuoco e a totale eccidio tutto il suo stato."—Lettere di diversi Autori. Venetia, 1556, p. 39. [Your reverend lordship knows, that our lord the pope, considering himself deeply obliged to that most serene king, would think nothing too great to do for his gratification ; but his beatitude the pope must still avoid giving the emperor cause for a new rupture, seeing that he is now victorious, and probably not indisposed to peace ; for not only would all hope of peace be destroyed by new dissensions with the emperor, but he would also put our lord to fire and slaughter through all his states.]

These events filled the last year of Clement's life; they were rendered all the more bitter by the consciousness that he was not altogether blameless as regarded them, and that his misfortunes were lamentably connected with his personal qualities. Day by day the course of things became more threatening and dark. Already was Francis preparing to make a new descent on Italy; and for this design he declared himself to have had the oral, if not the written, sanction of Clement's approval. The emperor would no longer be put off with pretences, and urged the assembling of the council more pressingly than ever. Family discords added their bitterness to these sufferings; after his labours and sacrifices for the reduction of Florence, the pope was doomed to see his two nephews enter into dispute for the sovereignty of that city, and proceed to the most savage hostilities against each other. His anxious reflections on all these calamities, with the fear of coming events, "sorrow and secret anguish," says Suriano, brought him to the grave.¹

We have pronounced Leo fortunate. Clement was perhaps a better man, certainly he had fewer faults, was more active, and as regarded details, even more acute than Leo ; but in all his concerns, whether active or passive, he was the very sport of misfortune ; without doubt the most ill-fated pontiff that ever sat on the papal throne was Clement VII. To the superiority of the hostile powers pressing on him from all sides, he opposed only the most uncertain policy, ever depending on the probabilities of the moment ; this it was that wrought his utter downfall. Those efforts for the establishment of an independent temporal power, to which his more celebrated predecessors had devoted their best energies, he was doomed in his own case to find leading to the very contrary results ; it was his lot to see those from whom he had hoped to rescue his native Italy, establish their dominion over her soil for ever. The great secession of the Protestants proceeded unremittingly before his eyes ; and the measures he adopted in the hope of arresting its progress, did but serve to give it wider and more rapid extension. He left the papal see immeasurably lowered in reputation, and deprived of all effectual influence, whether spiritual or temporal. Northern Germany, from of old so important to the papacy, to whose conversion in remote times the power of the popes was principally indebted for its establishment in the West ; and whose revolt against

¹ Suriano.—“L'imperatore non cessava di sollecitar il concilio. S. M. Christ^{ma}. dimandò che da S. S^a. li fussino osservate le promesse essendo le conditioni poste fra loro. Percio S. S^a. si pose a grandissimo pensiero e fu questo dolore et affanno che lo condusse alla morte. Il dolor fu accresciuto dalle pazzie del cardinal de' Medici, il quale allora piu che mai intendeva a rinuntiare il capello per la concorrenza alle cose di Fiorenza.” [The emperor did not cease to press for a council ; his most Christian majesty demanded that his holiness should fulfil the promises made to him ; and of which the conditions had been stipulated between them : whereupon his holiness gave himself up to heavy thoughts ; and this grief and anxiety it was that conducted him to his death. His sorrow was increased by the follies of Cardinal de' Medici, who was more than ever resolved at that time to renounce the cardinal's hat, for the purpose of entering into competition in the affairs of Florence.]

Henry IV had so largely aided them in the completion of their hierarchy, had now risen against them. To Germany belongs the undying merit of having restored Christianity to a purer form than it had presented since the first ages of the Church,—of having re-discovered the true religion. Armed with this weapon, Germany was unconquerable. Its convictions made themselves a path through all the neighbouring countries. Scandinavia had been among the first to receive them; they had diffused themselves over England, contrary to the purposes of the king, but under the protection of the measures he had pursued. In Switzerland they had struggled for, and, with certain modifications, had attained to, a secure and immoveable existence; they penetrated into France; we find traces of them in Italy, and even in Spain, while Clement yet lived. These waves roll ever onward. In these opinions there is a force that convinces and satisfies all minds; and that struggle between the spiritual and temporal interests, in which the papacy suffered itself to become involved, would seem to have been engaged in for the furtherance of their progress and the establishment of their universal dominion.

BOOK II

BEGINNING OF A REGENERATION OF CATHOLICISM

BEGINNING OF A REGENERATION OF CATHOLICISM

WE are not to believe that the influence of public opinion on the world has begun to make itself felt for the first time in our own day ; through every age of modern Europe, it has constituted an important element of social life. Who shall say whence it arises or how it is formed ; it may be regarded as the most peculiar product of that identification of interests which holds society in compact forms, as the most intelligible expression of those internal movements and revolutions, by which life, shared in common, is agitated. The sources whence it takes its rise are equally remote from observation with those whence its aliment is derived ; requiring little support from evidence or reason, it obtains the mastery over men's minds by the force of involuntary convictions. But only in its most general outlines is it in harmony with itself ; within these it is reproduced in greater or smaller circles innumerable, and with modifications varied to infinity. And since new observations and experiences are perpetually flowing in upon it, since original minds are ever arising, which, though affected by its course, are not borne along by its current, but rather themselves impress on it a powerful reaction ; it is thus involved in an endless series of metamorphoses : transient and multiform, it is sometimes more, sometimes less, in harmony with truth and right, being rather a tendency of the moment than a fixed system. It is sometimes the attendant only of the occurrence that it has contributed to produce, and from which it derives form and extension. There are times, nevertheless, when, encountering a rugged will that refuses to be overcome, it bursts forth into exorbitant demands. That its perception of defects and deficiencies is frequently the just one, must needs be confessed ; but the modes of proceeding required as the remedy,—these, its very nature forbids it to conceive with force of perception, or employ with effect. Thence it is, that in long lapses of time, it is sometimes to be found in directly opposite extremes ; as it aided to found the papacy, so was its help equally given to the overthrow of that power. In the times under consideration it was thoroughly profane ; it afterwards became entirely spiritual. We have seen it inclining towards Protestantism throughout the whole of Europe ; we shall also see, that in a great portion of the same quarter of the world, it will assume an entirely different colouring.

Let us begin by examining, first of all, in what manner the doctrines of the Protestants made progress even in Italy.

I. OPINIONS ANALOGOUS TO THOSE OF THE PROTESTANTS ENTERTAINED IN ITALY

Throughout the Italian peninsula, as elsewhere, an incalculable influence has been exercised on the development of science and art, by literary associations. They formed themselves, now around some prince, some distinguished scholar, or even some private individual of literary tastes and easy fortune ; or occasionally they grew up in the free companionship of equals. These societies are usually most valuable when they arise, naturally and without formal plan, from the immediate exigencies of the moment. It is with pleasure that we shall follow the traces they have left.

At the same time with the Protestant movements in Germany, there appeared certain literary societies, assuming a religious complexion, in Italy.

When, under Leo X, it became the tone of society to doubt or deny the truth of Christianity, a reaction displayed itself in the minds of many able men ; men who had acquired the high culture of the day, and took part in its refinements, while avoiding its depravities. It was natural that such persons should seek the society of each other; the human mind requires, or at least it clings to, the support of kindred opinion: this support is indispensable, as regards its religious convictions, for these have their basis in the most profound community of sentiment.

As early as the time of Leo X we find mention of an "Oratory of Divine Love," which had been founded by some distinguished men in Rome, for their mutual edification; they met for the worship of God, for preaching, and the practice of spiritual exercises, at the church of St. Silvestro and Dorothea, in the Trastevere, near the place where the apostle Peter is believed to have dwelt, and where he presided over the first assemblies of the Christians. The members were from fifty to sixty in number; among them were Contarini, Sadolet, Giberto, and Caraffa, all of whom afterwards became cardinals. Gaetano da Thiene, who was canonized, and Lippomano, a theological writer of high reputation and great influence, were also of the number; Giuliano Bathi, the priest of the church where they met, was the central point around which they grouped themselves.¹

That this association was by no means opposed to the doctrines of Protestantism, will be readily inferred from their place of assemblage; on the contrary, its views were to a certain extent in harmony with them; as, for example, in the hope entertained of arresting the general decadence of the church, by the revived force of religious convictions—the hope which stimulated Luther and Melancthon. This society consisted of men actuated at that moment by community of feeling, but great diversity of opinion was afterward displayed among them; and eventually this made itself manifest in tendencies altogether distinct and heterogeneous.

¹ I take this notice from Caracciolo: Vita di Paolo IV MS.—"Quei pochi huomini da bene ed eruditi prelati che erano in Roma in quel tempo di Leone X vedendo la città di Roma e tutto il resto d'Italia, dove per la vicinanza alla sede apostolica doveva più fiorire l'osservanza de' riti, essere così maltrattato il culto divino,—si unirono in un oratorio chiamato del Divino Amore circa sessanta di loro, per fare quivi quasi in una torre ogni sforzo per guardare le divine leggi." In the Vita Cajetani Thienaci (AA. SS. Aug. II), c. i. 7-10, Caracciolo repeats this with more minute details, but enumerates only fifty members. The Historia Clericorum regularium vulgo Theatinorum, by Joseph Silos, confirms it in many passages, which are printed in the Commentarius praeuius to the Vita Cajetani.

After the lapse of some years, we again meet with a certain portion of this Roman society in Venice.

Rome had been pillaged, Florence subdued, Milan was the mere haunt of factions, and battle-ground of contending armies; in this general ruin, Venice had remained undisturbed by foreigners or armies, and was considered to be the universal refuge. Here were assembled the dispersed literati of Rome, and those Florentine patriots against whom their native land was closed for ever; among these last more particularly, as may be seen in the historian Nardi, and in Bruccioli, the translator of the Bible, a very decided spirit of devotion, not unmarked by the influence of Savonarola, became manifest. This was shared by other refugees, and among them, by Reginald Pole, who had quitted England to withdraw himself from the innovations of Henry VIII. From their Venetian hosts, these distinguished men found a cordial welcome. In the circle of Peter Bembo of Padua, who kept open house, the point of discussion was more frequently mere letters, as Ciceronian Latin; but among the guests of Gregorio Cortesi, the learned and sagacious abbot of San Giorgio Maggiore in Venice, subjects of much more profound interest were agitated. Bruccioli makes the bowers and groves of San Giorgio the scene of some of his dialogues.

Near Treviso was Treville, the villa of Luigi Priuli.¹ He was one of those upright and accomplished Venetians, of whom we occasionally meet specimens in the present day, full of a calm susceptibility to true and noble sentiments, and formed for disinterested friendships. Here the inmates employed themselves chiefly in spiritual studies and conversation. Hither came the Benedictine, Marco of Padua, a man of profound piety, probably he from whom Pole declares himself to have drawn his spiritual nurture. Here also was the eminent Venetian Gaspar Contarini, who must be considered as the head of the assembly. Of him Pole says, that nothing which the human mind can discover by its own powers of investigation, was unknown to him; and nothing wanting to him that the grace of God has imparted to the human soul; and he further says that Contarini crowned his knowledge with virtue.

¹ Epistolae Reginaldi Poli, ed. Quirini, tom. ii. Diatriba ad epistolae Schelhornii, clxxxiii.

If we now inquire what were the leading convictions of these men, we find that foremost among them was the doctrine of justification, which, as taught by Luther, had originated the whole Protestant movement. Contarini wrote a special treatise concerning this, which Pole cannot find words strong enough to praise. "Thou," he exclaims to his friend, "thou hast brought forth that jewel which the Church was keeping half-concealed." Pole himself finds that Scripture, in its more profound and intimate revelations, is entirely in accordance with this doctrine. He congratulates Contarini on having been the first to bring to light "that holy, fruitful, indispensable truth."¹ To this circle of friends belonged M. A. Flaminio, who resided for some time with Pole, and whom Contarini desired to take with him into Germany. Let us observe how distinctly he professes this doctrine. "The Gospel," says he, in one of his letters,² "is no other than the glad tidings, that the only-begotten Son of God, clothed in our flesh, has satisfied for us the justice of the Eternal Father. Whoever believes this, enters the kingdom of God; he enjoys the universal forgiveness; from a carnal creature, he becomes spiritual; from being a child of wrath, he becomes a child of grace, and lives in a sweet peace of conscience." It would be difficult to announce the Lutheran doctrines in language more orthodox.

These convictions extended themselves, as a literary opinion or tendency might have done, over a great part of Italy.³

¹ Epistolae Poli, tom. iii. p. 57.

² To Theodorina Sauli, 12th Feb. 1542. Lettere volgari (Raccolta del Manuzio) Vinegia, 1553, ii. 43.

³ Among other documents, the letter of Sadolet to Contarini (Epistola Sadoleti, lib. ix. p. 365), in regard to his Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, is very remarkable. "In quibus commentariis," says Sadolet, "mortis et crucis Christi mysterium totum aperire atque illustrare sum conatus." He had not, however, quite satisfied Contarini, in whose opinion he did not entirely concur. He promises meanwhile to give, in his new edition, a clear explanation of original sin and grace: "De hoc ipso morbo naturae nostrae et de reparatione arbitrii nostri a Spiritu Sancto facta."

It is, however, highly worthy of remark, that an opinion so lately alluded to from time to time only in the schools, should now suddenly seize on the minds of men, and employ their intellectual activity through the whole of a century; for it is indisputable, that this doctrine of justification was the parent of wild commotions, dissensions, and even revolutions, throughout the greater part of the sixteenth century. One might almost declare, that this disposition of men's minds to occupy themselves with so transcendental a question, had arisen by way of counterpoise to the worldliness of the Church, which had now nearly lost all consciousness of the relation of God to man; that the examination of this, the most profound mystery of that relation, had been entered on, by the world generally, as a contrast to the blind indifference then affecting the hierarchy of Rome.

Even in the pleasure-loving Naples, these doctrines were promulgated, and that by a Spaniard, Juan Valdez, secretary to the viceroy. Unfortunately the writings of Valdez have wholly disappeared; but we may gather very explicit intimations of their character from the objections of his opponents. About the year 1540, a little book, "On the Benefits bestowed by Christ," was put into circulation; it "treated," as a report of the Inquisition expresses it, "in an insidious manner of justification, undervalued works and merits, ascribing all to faith; and as this was the very point at which so many prelates and-monks were stumbling, the book had been circulated to a great extent." Inquiries have frequently been made as to the author of this work; who he was we learn with certainty from the report just quoted. "It was," says this document, "a monk of San Severino, a disciple of Valdez, and the book was revised by Flaminio."¹ From this extract we find, then, that the authorship of the treatise, "On the Benefits of Christ," is due to a friend and pupil of Valdez. It had incredible success, and made the study of the doctrine of justification, for some time, popular in Italy. The pursuits of Valdez were, however, not exclusively theological, his attention being occupied in part by the duties of an important civil office. He founded no sect; this book resulted from a liberal study of Christian truth. His friends looked back with delight on the happy days they had enjoyed with him on the Chiaja, and at Posilippo, in that fair vicinity of Naples, "where nature rejoices in her splendour, and smiles at her own beauty." Valdez was mild, agreeable, and not without expansion of mind. "A part only of his soul," as his friends declare, "sufficed to animate his slight and feeble frame; the greater part, the clear, unclouded intellect, was ever uplifted in the contemplation of truth."

¹ Schelhorn, Gerdesius, and others, have ascribed this book to Aonius Palearius, who says, in a speech before the Senate at Siena, 1542, "ex Christi morte quanta commodasint allata humano generi cum hoc anno Tusce scripsissem, etc." The compendium of the inquisitors, which I found in Caracciolo, Vita di Paolo IV MS., expresses itself on the contrary, as follows: "Quel libro del beneficio di Christo, fu il suo autore un monaco di San Severino in Napoli, discepolo del Valdes, fu revisore di detto libro il Flaminio, fu stampato molte volte, ma particolarmente a Modena de mandato Moroni, ingannò molti, perchè trattava della giustificazione con dolce modo ma hereticamente." [The author

An extraordinary influence was exercised by Valdez over the nobility and learned men of Naples; a lively interest was also taken by the women of that day in this movement, of that book on the benefits of Christ, was a monk of San Severino in Naples, a disciple of Valdez—Flaminio was the revisor; it was often printed, but particularly at Modena, at the command of Morone; it deceived many, because it treated of justification in an attractive manner, but heretically.] Here is one good witness at variance with another. But since that passage from Palearius does not so clearly point out this book as to make it certain that no other is meant, since Palearius says he was called to account for it in the same year, while the compendium of the Inquisition expressly declares: "quel libro fu da molti approbato solo in Verona, fu conosciuto e reprobato, dopo molti anni fu posto nell' indice" [that book was approved by many in Verona alone, but being known and reprobated, was placed in the index many years after]; so I conclude that the opinions of the above-named scholars are erroneous, and have followed the report of the Inquisition. I do not deny, however, that the latter may be wrong. A copy of the book in its original tongue, Italian, has been sought for in vain. But it was translated into French, and from the French into English, in 1573. This translation, "The Benefits of Christ's Death," has been recently reprinted (1851) from the edition of 1638 by the Religious Tract Society, but the question of the authorship has not been settled. "Enquire not of the author," says the Preface, "he is unknown." Now, as then, the book is intended for direct edification. [Another edition was issued at Cambridge in 1855, containing a facsimile of the original Italian discovered in the Library of St. John's College, as well as the French translation of 1551, and an English MS. version by Edward Courtenay, Earl of Devonshire, made in 1548.]

at once religious and intellectual. Among these was Vittoria Colonna. After the death of her husband, Pescara, she had devoted herself entirely to study ; in her poems, as well as her letters, will be found evidence of a deeply felt morality, and unaffected sense of religious truth. How beautifully does she console a friend for the death of her brother, "whose peaceful spirit had entered into everlasting rest ; she ought not to complain, since she could now speak with him, unimpeded by those absences formerly so frequent, which prevented her from being understood by him."¹ Pole and Contarini were among her most confidential friends. I do not believe that she devoted herself to spiritual exercises of a monastic character ; I think, at least, that so much may be inferred from Aretino, who writes to her, with much simplicity, that "he is sure she does not take the silence of the tongue, casting down of the eyes, and assuming coarse raiment, to be essential, but purity of soul alone."

The house of Colonna generally was favourable to this religious movement, and more especially so were Vespasiano, duke of Palliano, and his wife, Giulia Gonzaga, the same who is reputed to have been the most beautiful woman in Italy. Valdez dedicated one of his books to Giulia.

These opinions had moreover made active progress among the middle classes. The report of the Inquisition would seem to exaggerate, when it reckons 3,000 schoolmasters as attached to them ; but admitting the number to be smaller, how deep an effect must have been produced on the minds of youth, and of the people !

With almost equal cordiality were these doctrines received in Modena. The bishop himself, Morone, an intimate friend of Pole and Contarini, received them favourably ; at his express command it was that the book, "On the Benefits of Christ," was printed, and extensively distributed. His chaplain, Don Girolamo da Modena, was president of a society in which the same principles prevailed.²

¹ Lettere volgari, i. 92. Lettere di diversi Autori, p. 604. The first of these is a particularly useful collection.

² In Schelhorn's Amoenitatt. Literar. tom. xii. p. 564, we find the Articuli contra Moronum, published by Vergerio in 1558, reprinted ; these accusations do not fail to appear there ; I took the more detailed notices from the compendium of the inquisitors.

Mention has from time to time been made of the Protestants in Italy, and we have already adduced several names recorded in their lists. There is no doubt that many of the convictions predominant in Germany had taken root in the minds of these men; they sought to establish the articles of their faith on the testimony of Scripture; in the particular of justification they did certainly approach very near to the doctrines of Luther. But that they adopted these on all other points must not be asserted; the conviction that the Church is one and indivisible, and reverence for the pope, were too deeply impressed on their minds to admit this; there were besides many Catholic usages too closely interwoven with the national character to have been easily departed from.

Flaminio composed an exposition of the Psalms, of which the dogmatic tenor has been approved by Protestant writers, but even to this he prefixed a dedication, wherein he calls the pope, "the warder and prince of all holiness, the vicegerent of God upon earth."

Giovan Battista Folengo ascribes justification to grace alone, he even speaks of the uses of sin, which is not far removed from the injury that may arise from good works. He remonstrates zealously against trusting in fasts, frequent prayers, masses, and confessions; nay, even in the priesthood itself, the tonsure or the mitre.¹ Yet, in the same convent of Benedictines, where he had taken his vows at sixteen, did he peaceably close his life at the age of sixty.²

It was for some time not far otherwise with Bernardino Ochino. If we may believe his own words, it was at the first a deep longing, as he expresses it, "for the heavenly paradise to be achieved through God's grace," that led him to become a Franciscan. His zeal was so fervid that he soon passed over to the severer discipline and penances of the Capuchins. Of this order he was elected general in its third chapter, and again in the fourth, an office that he filled to the satisfaction of all. But however rigorous his life (he went always on foot, had no other bed than his cloak, drank no wine, and strictly enforced the rule of poverty on others also, as the most effectual means for attaining evangelical perfection), yet did he gradually become convinced and penetrated by the doctrine of justification by grace alone. Earnestly then did he preach it from the pulpit, and urge it in the confessional. "I opened my heart to him," says Bembo, "as I should have done to Christ himself. I felt as I looked at him that I had never beheld a holier man." Cities poured forth their multitudes to his teachings, the churches were too small for his hearers, all were alike edified, old and young, men and women, the profound scholar and the untaught peasant. His coarse raiment, his grey hair, and beard that swept his breast, his pale emaciated countenance, and the feebleness brought on by his persistence in fasting, gave him the aspect of a saint.¹

¹ Ad Psalm. 67, f. 246. An extract from these explanations will be found in Gerdesius, Italia Reformata, pp. 257-261.

² Thuani Historiae, ad a. 1559, i. 473.

There was thus a line within Catholicism which the opinions analogous to Lutheranism did not overpass. Priesthood and the monastic orders encountered no opposition in Italy, nor was there any thought of questioning the supremacy of the pope. How indeed could such a man as Pole, for example, be otherwise than strongly attached to this last principle, he who had fled his native land in preference to acknowledging his own king as head of the church? They thought, as Ottonel Vida, a disciple of Vergerio, expresses himself to his master, "in the Christian church has each man his appointed office: on the bishop is laid the care of the souls in his diocese; these he is to guard from the world and the evil spirit. It is the duty of the metropolitan to secure the residence of the bishop, and he is himself again subjected to the pope, to whom has been confided the general government of the Church, which it is his duty to guard and guide with holiness of mind. Every man should be vigilant and upright in his vocation."² Separation from the Church was regarded by these men as the extremity of evil. Isidoro Clario, who corrected the Vulgate, with the assistance of the Protestant writers, and prefixed an introduction which was subjected to expurgation, warns the Protestants against any such intention in a treatise written for that especial purpose. "No corruption," he declares, "can be so great as to justify a defection from the hallowed communion of the Church." "Is it not better," he demands, "to repair what we have, than to endanger all by dubious attempts to produce something new? Our sole thought should be, how the old institution could be ameliorated and freed from its defects."

¹ Boverio : Annali di Frati Minori Capuccini, i. 375. Gratiani : Vie de Commendone, p. 143.

² Ottonello Vida Dot. al Vescovo Vergerio : Lettere volgari, i. 80.

With these modifications, the new doctrines had a large number of adherents in Italy, among them Antonio dei Pagliarici of Siena, to whom had even been attributed the authorship of the work, "On the Benefits bestowed by Christ;" Carnesecchi of Florence, who is mentioned as a disseminator of this work, and as upholding its tenets; Giovan Battista Rotto of Bologna, who was protected by Morone, Pole, and Vittoria Colonna, and who found means to aid the poorest of his followers with money and other succours; Fra Antonio of Volterra, and indeed some man of eminence in nearly every town of Italy, connected themselves with the professors of these doctrines.¹ It was a system of feelings and opinions, decidedly religious, but tempered by attachment to the Church and its forms, which moved the whole land from one end to the other, and in every phase of society.

¹ Our authority on this subject is the extract from the Compendium of the Inquisitors. Bologna, says this document, "fu in molti pericoli, perchè vi furono heretici principali, fra quali fu un Gio. B^a. Rotto, il quale haveva amicizia et appoggio di persone potentissime, come di Morone, Polo, Marchesa di Pescara, e raccoglieva danari a tutto suo potere, e gli compartiva tra gli heretici occulti e poveri, che stavano in Bologna; abjurò poi nelle mani del padre Salmerone (the Jesuit), per ordine del legato di Bologna." (Compendio, fol 9, c. 94.) [Bologna was in great peril, because heretics of great note were there, among them one Gio. B^a. Rotto, who had the friendship and support of very powerful persons, as Morone, Pole, and the Marchesa di Pescara; he collected money with all his strength, and divided it among the poor and concealed heretics who were in Bologna. He afterwards recanted before Father Salmerone, by order of the legate of Bologna.] The same course was pursued in all the towns.

2. ATTEMPTS AT INTERNAL REFORM, AND A RECONCILIATION WITH THE PROTESTANTS

An expression has been attributed to Pole, to the effect that a man should content himself with his own inward convictions, without greatly encumbering his thoughts as to whether there were errors and abuses in the church.¹ Yet it was precisely from a party to which he himself belonged that the first attempt at a reformation proceeded.

The most honourable act of Paul III, and that by which he signalled his accession to the papal throne, was the elevation of many distinguished men to the college of cardinals without any consideration but that of their personal merits. The first of these was the Venetian Contarini, by whom the others were afterwards proposed. They were men of irreproachable character, in high repute for learning and piety, and well acquainted with the requirements of different countries. Caraffa, for example, who had long resided in Spain and the Netherlands; Sadolet, bishop of Carpentras in France; Pole, a refugee from England; Giberto, who, after having long taken active part in administering the affairs of the state, was then ruling his bishopric of Verona with exemplary wisdom; Federigo Fregoso, archbishop of Salerno, almost all, be it observed, members of the Oratory of Divine Love, before mentioned, and many of them holding opinions inclining to Protestantism.²

It was these same cardinals who now prepared a plan for the reform of the Church by command of the pope himself. This became known to the Protestants, who rejected it with derision. They had indeed meanwhile advanced far beyond its most liberal provisions. But it is difficult to deny the extreme significance of such an act on the part of the Catholic church. Here we have the evil grappled with in Rome itself. In the presence of the pope it was that former popes were accused of misgovernment, and, in the introduction to the document now laid before him, his predecessors were accused of having "frequently chosen servants, not as desiring to learn from them what their duties demanded, but rather to procure the declaration that those things were lawful towards which their desires led them." This abuse of the supreme power was declared to be the most prolific source of corruption.¹

¹ Passages from Atanagi in Mc'Crie's Reformation in Italy, 2nd edition, 1833, p. 204.

² Vita Reginaldi Poli, in the edition of his letters by Quirini, tom. i. p. 12. Florebelli de vita Jacobi Sadoleti Commentarius, prefixed to the Epp. Sadoleti, Col. 1590, vol. iii.

Nor did matters rest there. Certain short pieces are extant, written by Gaspar Contarini, in which he makes unsparing war on those abuses most especially, from which the Curia derived profit. The practice of compositions or the acceptance of money in payment for spiritual favours, he denounces as simony that may be considered a kind of heresy. It was taken very ill that he should inculcate former popes. "How!" he exclaims, "shall we concern ourselves about the fame of three or four popes, and not amend what has been suffered to decay, and win a good reputation for ourselves? In good truth it would be asking very much, to require that we should defend all the acts of all the popes!" The abuse of dispensations also he attacks most earnestly and effectively; he considers it idolatrous to say, as many did, that the pope was restrained by no other rule than his absolute will from the suspension or confirmation of the positive law and right. What he says on this subject is well worth repeating: "The law of Christ," he declares, "is a law of freedom, and forbids a servitude so abject that the Lutherans were entirely justified in comparing it with the Babylonish captivity. But furthermore, can that be called a government of which the rule is the will of one man, by nature prone to evil, and liable to the influence of caprices and affections innumerable? No; all true dominion is a dominion of reason, whose aim is to lead all whom it governs to the proposed end—happiness.

¹ This is the Consilium delectorum cardinalium et aliorum praelatorum de emendanda ecclesia before alluded to. It is signed by Contarini, Caraffa, Sadolet, Pole, Fregoso, Giberto, Cortese, and Aleander.

The authority of the pope is equally with others a dominion of reason. God has conferred this rule on St. Peter and his successors, that they might lead the flocks confided to their care into everlasting blessedness. A pope should know that those over whom he exercises this rule are free men; not according to his own pleasure must he command, or forbid, or dispense, but in obedience to the rule of reason, of God's commands, and to the law of love, referring every thing to God, and doing all in consideration of the common good only. For positive laws are not to be imposed by mere will, they must be ever in unison with natural rights, with the commandments of God, and with the requirements of circumstances. Nor can they be altered or abrogated, except in conformity with this guidance and with the imperative demands of things." "Be it the care of your holiness," he exclaims to Paul III, "never to depart from this rule; be not guided by the impotence of the will which makes choice of evil; submit not to the servitude which ministers to sin. Then wilt thou be mighty, then wilt thou be free, then will the life of the Christian commonwealth be sustained in thee."¹

It will be seen that this was an attempt to found a papacy guided by reasonable laws, and it is the more remarkable as proceeding from that same doctrine regarding justification and free-will, which had served as the groundwork of the Protestant secession. We do not merely conjecture this from our knowledge that Contarini held these opinions; he declares it in express terms. He asserts that man is prone to evil, that this proceeds from the impotence of the will, which, when it turns to evil, becomes rather passive than active; only through the grace of Christ is it made free. He afterwards utters a distinct recognition of the papal authority, but demands that it be exercised in obedience to the will of God and for the common good.

Contarini laid his writings before the pope. In a bright and cheerful day of November, in the year 1538, he journeyed with him to Ostia: "On the way thither," he writes to Pole, "this our good old man made me sit beside him, and talked with me alone about the reform of the compositions. He told me that he had by him the little treatise I had written on the subject, and that he had read it in his morning hours. I had already given up all hope, but he now spoke to me with so much Christian feeling, that my hopes have been awakened anew; I now believe that God will do some great thing, and not permit the gates of hell to prevail against his Holy Spirit."¹

¹ G. Contarini Cardinalis ad Paulum III P. M. de potestate Pontificis in compositionibus, printed by Rocaberti, Bibliotheca Pontificia Maxima, tom. xiii. I have also in my possession a Tractatus de compositionibus datarii Rev^{mi}. D. Gasparis Contarini, 1536, which, so far as I can find, has never been printed.

It may be readily comprehended, that a complete reformation of abuses, in which were involved so many personal rights and conflicting claims, and which had become so closely interwoven with all the habits of life, was of all things the most difficult that could be undertaken. Nevertheless, Pope Paul did gradually seem disposed to enter earnestly on the task.

He appointed commissions, accordingly, for carrying reform into effect,² as regarded the Apostolic Chamber, the Ruota, Chancery, and Penitentiaria: he also recalled Giberto to his counsels. Bulls, enacting reform, appeared, and preparations were made for that council so dreaded and shunned by Pope Clement, and which Paul also might have found many reasons of a private nature for desiring to avoid.

And now, supposing ameliorations really to have been made, the Roman court reformed, and the abuses of the constitution done away with: if then, that same tenet from which Luther had started, had been taken as the principle of renovation in life and doctrine, might not a reconciliation have been possible? For even the Protestants did not tear themselves hastily or without reluctance from the communion of the Church.

To many minds this seemed possible, and earnest hopes were founded on the results of the religious conference.

According to theory the pope should not have permitted

¹ Gaspar C. Contarinus Reginaldo C. Polo. Ex ostiis Tiberinis, 11th Nov. 1538. (Epp. Poli, ii. 142.)

² Acta consistorialia (6 Aug. 1540) in Rainaldus, Annales Ecclesiastici, tom. xxi. p. 146.

this conference, since its object was to determine religious differences (as to which he claimed the supreme right of judging) by the intervention of the secular power. Paul was, in fact, extremely reserved on the occasion of this council, though he suffered it to proceed, and even sent his deputies to be present at the sittings.

The affair was proceeded in with great circumspection; men of moderate character being carefully selected—persons, indeed, who fell afterwards under the suspicion of Protestantism: he, moreover, gave them judicious rules for the direction of their political conduct, and even for the government of their lives.

Thus, for example, when he sent Morone, who was yet young, to Germany in the year 1536, he strictly enjoined him to “contract no debts, but pay all things regularly in the lodgings assigned him:” further, Morone was recommended “to clothe himself without luxury, but also without meanness; to frequent the churches, certainly, but to avoid all appearance of hypocrisy.” He was, in fact, to represent in his own person that Roman reform of which so much had been said, and was advised to maintain a “dignity tempered by cheerfulness.”¹ In the year 1540, the bishop of Vienna had recommended a very extreme course. He was of opinion that those articles of Luther and Melancthon’s creed, which had been declared heretical, should be laid before the adherents of the new doctrines, and that they should be directly and shortly asked whether they would renounce them or not. To such a measure, however, the pope would by no means instruct his nuncio. “We fear they would rather die,” said he, “than make such a recantation.”² His best hope was to see only the prospect of a reconciliation. On the first gleam of this, he would send a formula, in terms free from all offence, which had been already prepared by wise and venerable men. "Would it were come to that! Scarcely do we dare to expect it!"

¹ Instructio pro causa fidei et concilii data episcopo Mutinae. 24 Oct. 1536, MS.

² Instruktionen pro Rev^{mo}. D. Ep. Mutinensi, apostolico nuncio interfuturo conventui Germanorum Spirae, 12 Maij, 1540, celebrando.—“Timendum est atque adeo certo sciendum, ista, quae in his articulis pie et prudenter continentur, non solum fretos salvo conductu esse eos recusaturos, verum etiam ubi mors praesens immineret, illam potius prae-electuros.”

But never were parties in a better position to warrant this hope of the pontiff than at the conference of Ratisbon in the year 1541. Political relations looked extremely favourable; the emperor, who desired to employ all the forces of the Empire in a war with the Turks or with France, wished for nothing more earnestly than a reconciliation. He chose the most sagacious and temperate men he could find among the Catholic theologians, namely, Gropper and Julius Pflug, to proceed to the conference. On the other side, the Landgrave Philip was again on good terms with Austria, and hoped to obtain the chief command in the war for which men were preparing themselves. With admiration and delight the emperor beheld this warlike chief ride into Ratisbon on his stately charger, the rider no less vigorous than his steed. The pacific Bucer and gentle Melancthon appeared on the Protestant side.

The earnest desire of Paul for an amicable result from this conference, was made manifest by his choice of the legate whom he sent to it,—no other than that Gaspar Contarini, whom we have seen so profoundly attached to the new modes of thought that were prevalent in Italy; so active in devising measures of general reform. He now assumed a position of still higher importance: placed as he was midway between two systems of belief—between two parties that were dividing the world,—commissioned, at a moment of peculiarly advantageous aspect, to reconcile these parties, and earnestly desiring to effect that purpose. It is a position which, if it does not impose on us the duty of considering his personal character more clearly, yet renders it allowable that we should do so.

Messer Gaspar Contarini, the eldest son of a noble house in Venice, which traded to the Levant, had especially devoted himself to philosophical pursuits: his mode of proceeding in regard to them is not unworthy of remark: he set apart three hours daily for his closer studies, never devoting to them more, and never less; he began each time with exact repetition. Adhering to this method, he proceeded to the conclusion of each subject, never allowing himself to do anything lightly or with half measures.¹ He would not permit the subtleties of Aristotle's commentators to lead him into similar subtleties, perceiving that nothing is more astute than falsehood. He displayed the most remarkable talent, with a steadiness still more remarkable; he did not seek to acquire the graces of language, but expressed himself with simplicity and directly to the purpose, —as in nature the growing plant is unfolded in regular succession, yearly producing its due results, so did his faculties develope themselves.

When, at an early age, he was elected into the council of the Pregadi, the senate of his native city, he did not for some time venture to speak; he wished to do so, and felt no want of matter, but he could not find courage for the effort: when at length he did prevail on himself to overcome this reluctance, his speech, though not remarkable for grace or wit, and neither very animated nor very energetic, was yet so simple and so much to the purpose, that he at once acquired the highest consideration.

His lot was cast in a most agitated period. He beheld his native city stripped of her territory, and himself aided in the recovery. On the first arrival of Charles V in Germany, Contarini was sent to him as ambassador, and he there became aware of the dissensions then beginning to arise in the Church. They entered Spain at the moment when the ship Vittoria had returned from the first circumnavigation of the globe,² and Contarini was the first, so far as I can discover, to solve the problem of her entering the port one day later than she should have done according to the reckoning in her log-book. The pope, to whom he was sent after the sack of Rome, was reconciled to the emperor, partly by his intervention. His sagacious and penetrating views of men and things, together with his enlightened patriotism, are clearly evinced by his short essay on the Venetian constitution, a most instructive and well-arranged little work, as also by the different reports of his embassies, which are still occasionally to be found in manuscript.¹

¹ Joannis Casae Vita Gasparis Contarini; in Jo. Casae Monumentis Latinis, ed Hal. 1708, p. 88.

² Beccatelli, Vita del C. Contarini (Epp. Poli, iii.), p. 103. There is also a separate edition, but it is taken from the volume of letters, and the numbers of the pages are the same.

On a Sunday, in the year 1535, at the moment when the imperial council had assembled, and Contarini, who had meanwhile risen to the highest offices, was seated by the balloting urn, the intelligence came, that Pope Paul, whom he did not know, and with whom he had no sort of connection, had appointed him cardinal. All hastened to congratulate the astonished man, who could scarcely believe the report. Aluise Mocenigo, who had hitherto been his opponent in affairs of state, exclaimed that the republic had lost her best citizen.²

For the Venetian nobleman there was nevertheless one painful consideration attached to this honourable event. Should he abandon his free native city, which offered him its highest dignities, or in any case a sphere of action where he might act in perfect equality with the first in the state, for the service of a pope, often the mere slave of passion, and restricted by no effectual law? Should he depart from the republic of his forefathers, whose manners were in harmony with his own, to measure himself against others in the luxury and display of the Roman court? We are assured that he accepted the cardinalate, principally because it was represented to him, that in times so difficult, the refusal of this high dignity (having the appearance of despising it) might produce an injurious effect.³

And now, the zeal that he had formerly devoted with exclusive affection to his native country was applied to the affairs of the Church generally. He was frequently opposed by the cardinals, who considered it extraordinary that one but just called to the sacred college, and a Venetian, should attempt reform in the court of Rome. Sometimes the pope himself was against him; as when Contarini opposed the nomination of a certain cardinal. "We know," said the pontiff, "how men sail in these waters, the cardinals have no mind to see another made equal to them in honour." Offended by this remark, the Venetian replied, "I do not consider the cardinal's hat to constitute my highest honour."

¹ The first is of 1525, the other of 1530. The first is particularly important for the earlier times of Charles V. I have found no trace of it either in Vienna or Venice; in Rome I discovered one copy, but have never been able to get sight of another.

² Daniel Barbaro to Domenico Veniero. Lettere volgari, i. p. 73.

³ Cas, p. 102.

In this new position he maintained all his usual gravity, simplicity, and activity of life, all his dignity and gentleness of demeanour; nature leaves not the simply-formed plant without the ornament of its blossom, in which its being exhales and communicates itself. In man, it is the disposition, the character, which, being the collective product of all his higher faculties, stamps its impress on his moral bearing, nay, even on his aspect and manner; in Contarini this was evinced in the suavity, the inherent truthfulness and pure moral sense, by which he was distinguished; but above all in that deep religious conviction which renders man happy in proportion as it enlightens him.

Adorned with such qualities, moderate, nearly approaching the Protestant tenets in their most important characteristics, Contarini appeared in Germany; by a regeneration of church doctrines, commencing from this point, and by the abolition of abuses, he hoped to reconcile the existing differences.

But had not these already gone too far? Was not the breach too widely extended? Had not the dissentient opinions struck root too deeply? These questions I should be reluctant to decide.

There was also another Venetian, Marino Giustiniano, who left Germany shortly before this diet, and who would seem to have examined the aspect of things with great care. To him the reconciliation appears very possible.¹ But he declares that certain concessions are indispensable. The following he particularizes:—"The pope must no longer claim to be the vicegerent of Christ in temporal as well as spiritual things. He must depose the profligate and ignorant bishops and priests, appointing men of blameless lives, and capable of guiding and instructing the people, in their places; the sale of masses, the plurality of benefices, and the abuse of compositions must no longer be suffered; a violation of the rule as regards fasting must be visited by very light punishment at the most." If in addition to these things, the marriage of priests be permitted, and the communion in both kinds be allowed, Guistiniano believes that the Germans would at once abjure their dissent, would yield obedience to the pope in spiritual affairs, resign their opposition to the mass, submit to auricular confession, and even allow the necessity of good works as fruits of faith,—in so far, that is, as they are the consequence of faith. The existing discord having arisen because of abuses, so there is no doubt that by the abolition of these it may be done away with.

¹ Relazione del Clar^{mo}. M. Marino Giustinian Kav^{re}. (ritornato) dalla legazione di Germania sotto Ferdinando, re di Romani.—Bibl. Corsini in Rome, No. 481.

And on this subject we shall do well to remember what the Landgrave, Philip of Hesse, had declared the year before; namely, that the temporal power of the bishops might be tolerated, whenever means should be found for securing the suitable exercise of their spiritual authority. That, as regarded the mass, an agreement might be made, provided the communion in both kinds were conceded.¹ Joachim of Brandenburg declared himself ready to acknowledge the pope's supremacy. Meanwhile advances were made from the other side also. The imperial ambassador declared repeatedly that concessions should be agreed to by both parties, so far as was consistent with the honour of God. Even the non-protesting party would have willingly seen the spiritual power withdrawn from the bishops throughout Germany; they being now to all intents secular princes: this power they would then have had placed in the hands of superintendents, when means might have been adopted for a general change in the administration of church property. There was already some talk of things neutral and indifferent, that might either be retained or omitted, and even in the ecclesiastical electorates, prayers were appointed to be offered up for a prosperous issue to the work of reconciliation.

¹ Letter from the landgrave in Rommel's Urkundenbuch, p. 85. Compare this with the letter of the bishop of Lund in Seckendorf, p. 299. Contarini al Cardinal Farnese, 1541, 28 April (Epp. Poli, iii. p. 255). The landgrave and the elector both demanded the marriage of priests and communion in both kinds; the former made more difficulty with respect to the pope's supremacy, the latter with regard to the doctrine, "de missa quod sit sacrificium."

In what degree this reconciliation was either possible or probable need not be made the subject of dispute; it would in all cases have been extremely difficult; but if only the most remote probability existed, it was worth the attempt. Thus much is obvious, that a great wish for reunion had certainly arisen, and that many hopes and expectations were built on it.

And now came the question as to how far the pope, without whom nothing could be done, was disposed to depart from the rigour of his demands. On this point a certain part of the instructions given to Contarini at his departure is worthy of attention.¹

The unlimited power with which the emperor had pressed Paul to invest the legate had not been accorded, the pope suspecting that demands might be made in Germany, which not only the legate, but even he, the pontiff, might find it dangerous to concede without first consulting the other nations. Yet he did not decline all negotiations. "We must first see," he remarks, "whether the Protestants are in accord with us as to essential principles; for example, the supremacy of the Holy See, the sacraments, and some others." If we ask what these "others" were, we find that on this point the pope does not clearly express himself concerning them. He describes them generally, as, "whatever is sanctioned by the Holy Scriptures, as well as by the perpetual usage of the Church, with which the legate is well acquainted." "On this basis," he further observes, "attempts may be made for the arrangement of all differences."²

¹ Instructio data Rev^{mo}. Cli. Contareno in Germaniam legato, d. 28 mensis Januarii, 1541, to be seen in MS. in various libraries, and printed in Quirini; Epp. Poli, iii. 286.

² "Videndum imprimis est, an Protestantes et ii qui ab ecclesiae gremio defecerunt, in principiis nobiscum conveniant, cujusmodi est hujus sanctae Sedis primatus, tanquam a Deo et Salvatore nostro institutus, sacrosanctae ecclesiae sacramenta et alia quaedam, quae tum sacrarum litterarum autoritate, tum universalis ecclesiae perpetua observatione, hactenus observata et comprobata fuere et tibi nota esse bene scimus, quibus statim initio admissis omnis super aliis controversiis concordia tentaretur." We must not fail to keep in view the position

This vague mode of expression was beyond all question adopted with design. Paul III may have been willing to see how far Contarini could proceed towards a settlement of affairs, and reluctant to bind himself beforehand to a ratification of all his legate's acts; he chose beside to give Contarini a certain latitude. It would without doubt have cost the legate new efforts and infinite labour, to make those concessions acceptable to the obstinate Roman Curia, which, though only obtained by great effort at Ratisbon, were yet certain of being unsatisfactory at Rome. In the first instance every thing depended on a reconciliation and union among the assembled theologians; the conciliatory and mediate tendency was still too weak and undefined to possess any great efficacy; as yet it could scarcely receive a name, nor, until it had gained some fixed station, could any available influence be hoped from it.

The discussions were opened on the 5th of April, 1541, and a plan of proceeding, proposed by the emperor, and admitted after some slight alterations by Contarini, was adopted; but even here, at the first step, the legate found it requisite to dissent in a certain measure from his instructions. The pope had required, in the first place, a recognition of his supremacy, but Contarini perceived clearly, that on this point, so well calculated to arouse the passions of the assembly, the whole affair might be wrecked at the very outset; he therefore permitted the question of papal supremacy to be placed last, rather than first on the list for discussion. He thought it safer to begin with subjects on which his friends and himself approached the Protestant opinions, which were besides questions of the highest importance, and touching the very foundations of the faith. In the discussions concerning these, he took himself most active part. His secretary assures us, that nothing was determined by the Catholic divines, until he had been previously consulted, not the slightest variation made without his consent.¹ Morone, bishop of Modena, Tomaso da Modena, master of the pope, which was in the highest degree orthodox, and, from its very nature, inflexible, in order to comprehend how much lay in such a turn of affairs.

¹ Beccatelli, Vita del Cardinal Contarini, p. 117.

of the sacred palace, both holding the same opinions with himself as to justification, assisted him with their advice.¹ The principal difficulty proceeded from a German theologian, Doctor Eck, the old antagonist of Luther; but when forced to a close discussion, point by point, he also was at length brought to a satisfactory explanation. In effect, the parties did actually agree (who could have dared to hope so much?) as to the four primary articles, of human nature, original sin, redemption, and even justification. Contarini assented to the principal point in the Lutheran doctrine, namely, that justification is obtained by faith alone, and without any merit on the part of man; adding only, that this faith must be living and active. Melancthon acknowledged that this was in fact a statement of the Protestant belief itself;² and Bucer boldly declared, that in the articles mutually admitted, "every thing requisite to a godly, righteous, and holy life before God, and in the sight of man, was comprehended."³

Equally satisfied were those of the opposite party. The bishop of Aquila calls this conference holy, and did not doubt that the reconciliation of all Christendom would result from its labours. The friends of Contarini, those who shared his opinions and sympathised with his feelings, were delighted with the progress he was making. "When I perceived this unanimity of opinion," remarks Pole in a letter of this period to Contarini, "I was sensible of such pleasure as no harmony of sounds could have afforded me, not only because I foresee the coming of peace and union, but because these articles are in very truth the foundations of the Christian faith. They seem, indeed, to treat of various matters, faith, works, and justification; upon this last, however, on justification, do all the rest repose. I wish thee joy, my friend, and I thank God, that on this point the divines of both parties have agreed. We hope that He who hath so mercifully begun this work, will also complete it."¹

¹ Pallavicini, iv. 14, 433, from Contarini's Letters.

² Melancthon to Camerarius, 10th May (Epp. p. 360).—"Adsentiantur justificari homines fide, et quidem in eam sententiam ut nos docemus." Compare Planck, Geschichte des protestantischen Lehrbegriffs, iii. ii. 93.

³ All the negotiations and documents, for the reconciliation of the religious parties, executed by his imperial majesty, A.D. 1541, by Martin Bucer, in Hortleder, book i. chap. 37, pp. 280.

This, if I do not mistake, was a moment of most eventful import, not for Germany only, but for the whole world. With regard to the former, the points we have intimated tended in their consequences to change the whole ecclesiastical constitution of the land; to secure a position of increased liberty as regarded the pope, and a freedom from temporal encroachment on his part. The unity of the Church would have been maintained, and with it that of the nation. But infinitely farther than even this, would the consequences have extended. If the moderate party, from whom these attempts proceeded, and by whom they were conducted, had been able to maintain the predominance in Rome and in Italy, how entirely different an aspect must the Catholic world necessarily have assumed!

A result so extraordinary was, however, not to be obtained without a vehement struggle.

Whatever was resolved on at Ratisbon, must be confirmed by the sanction of the pope, on the one hand, and the assent of Luther on the other: to these latter a special embassy was sent.

But already many difficulties here presented themselves. Luther, who at first declared himself not altogether adverse, soon began to suspect that, leaving deception out of the question, the whole matter was a joke on the part of his enemies. He could not persuade himself that the doctrine of justification had really taken root among Catholics. In the articles agreed upon, he could see nothing but a piecemeal arrangement, made up from both systems. He, who considered himself to be continually engaged in a conflict between heaven and hell, imagined that here also he discerned the labours of Satan. He most earnestly dissuaded his master, the elector, from proceeding to the diet in person, declaring that "he was the very man for whom the devil was in search;"¹ and certainly the appearance of the elector, and his assent to the resolutions adopted, would have had an important effect.

¹ Polus Contareno. Capranicae, 17 May, 1541. Epp. Poli, tom. iii. p. 25. The letters of the bishop of Aquila in Rainaldus, 1541, Nos. 11, 12, also deserve attention. It was believed, that if the point of the Lord's Supper could be settled, every other difficulty might be readily arranged. "Id unum est quod omnibus spem maximam facit, assertio Caesaris se nullo pacto nisi rebus bene compositis discessurum, atque etiam quod omnia scitu consiliisque rev^{mt}. legati in colloquio a nostris theologis tractantur et disputantur."

These articles meanwhile had arrived in Rome, where they awakened universal interest. The cardinals Caraffa and San Marcello found extreme offence in the declaration respecting justification; and it was not without great difficulty that Priuli made its real import obvious to them.² The pope did not express himself so decidedly as Luther had done; it was signified to the legate by Cardinal Farnese, that his holiness neither accepted nor declined the conclusions arrived at; but that all others who had seen the articles thought they might have been expressed in words much clearer and more precise, if the meaning of them were in accordance with the Catholic faith.

But however strenuous this theological opposition, it was neither the only, nor perhaps the most effectual one; there was yet another, proceeding from causes partly political.

A reconciliation, such as that contemplated, would have given an unaccustomed unity to all Germany, and would have greatly extended the power of the emperor, who would have been at no loss to avail himself of this advantage.³ As chief of the moderate party, he would inevitably have obtained predominant influence throughout Europe, more especially in the event of a general council. All the accustomed hostilities were necessarily awakened at the mere prospect of such a result.

¹ Corpus Ref. iv. p. 397. Luther to John Frederick, in De Wette's collection, v. 353, 377.

² I cannot pardon Quirini for having failed to give un mutilated the letter of Priuli touching these affairs, which he had in his hands.

³ There was always an imperial party, which promoted this tendency; and here, among other things, will be found the whole secret of those negotiations undertaken by the archbishop of Lund. He had represented to the emperor—"che se S. M. volesse tollerare che i Lutherani stessero nelli loro errori, disponeva a modo e voler suo di tutta la Germania."—Instruzione di Paolo III, a Montepulciano, 1539. [If his majesty would endure that the Lutherans should remain in their errors, he might dispose of all Germany at his will and pleasure.] The emperor himself also then desired toleration.

Francis I. considered himself as more particularly threatened, and neglected no means that might serve to impede the projected union; he remonstrated earnestly against the concessions made by the legate at Ratisbon,¹ declaring that "his conduct discouraged the good, and emboldened the wicked; that from extreme compliance to the emperor, he was permitting things to get to such extremities as would soon be irremediable; the advice of other princes also ought surely to have been taken." Affecting to consider the pope and church in danger, he promised to defend them with his life, and with all the resources of his kingdom.

Other scruples besides those of a theological description before mentioned, had already arisen in Rome. It was remarked that the emperor, on opening the diet and announcing a general council, did not add that the pope alone had power to convene it: symptoms it was thought appeared of an inclination on his part to arrogate that right to himself. It was even said that in the old articles agreed on with Clement VII at Barcelona, there was a passage that might intimate such a purpose. Did not the Protestants continually declare that it rested with the emperor to summon a council? And might not he be supposed to receive favourably an opinion so manifestly in harmony with his own interests?² Herein was involved the most imminent danger of further divisions.

Meanwhile Germany also was in movement. We are assured by Giustiniani, that the importance accruing to the landgrave from his position as head of the Protestant party, had already tempted others to secure themselves equal influence by assuming the lead of the Catholics. A member of this diet assures us, that the dukes of Bavaria were adverse to all proposals for agreement, and that the elector of Mainz displayed hostility equally decided. He cautioned the pope, in a letter written specially to that effect, against a national council, and indeed against any council to be held in Germany; "where the concessions demanded would be exorbitant."¹ Other documents also are extant, in which certain German Catholics complain directly to the pope of the progress made by Protestantism at the diet, the pliability of Gropper and Pflug, and the absence of Catholic princes from the discussions.²

¹ He spoke of it to the papal ambassadors at his court. Il C^l. di Mantova al C^l. Contarini, in Quirini, iii. 278. Loces, 17 Maggio, 1541. "S. M^a. Ch^{ma}. diveniva ogni dì più ardente nelle cose della chiesa, le quali era risoluto di voler difendere e sostenere con tutte le forze sue e con la vita sua e de' figliuoli, giurandomi che da questo si moveva principalmente a far questo officio." Granvelle had, on the other hand, different instructions:—"He declared to me," says Contarini, in a letter to Farnese, ibid. 255, "on oath, that he had letters in hand written by the most Christian king to the Protestant princes, exhorting them by no means to make agreement with the Catholics, and avowing himself desirous to learn their opinions, which were not displeasing to him." According to this, Francis impeded the reconciliation by efforts with both sides.

² Ardinghello, al nome del C^l. Farese al C^l. Contarini, 29 Maggio, 1541.

Suffice it to say, that in Rome, France, and Germany, there arose among the enemies of Charles V, among those who either were or appeared to be the most zealous for Catholicism, a determined opposition to his efforts for the conciliation of differences. An unusual degree of intimacy was remarked in Rome as existing between the pontiff and the French ambassador. It was thought the former meant to propose a marriage between Vittoria Farnese, his relative, and a member of the house of Guise.

A powerful effect was inevitably produced by these agitations on the different divines. Eck remained in Bavaria. "The enemies of the emperor, whether in or out of Germany," says the secretary of Contarini, "dreading the power he would obtain in the union of all Germany, began to sow the tares of discord among these divines. Carnal envy hath interrupted the conference."³ If we consider how many difficulties were involved in the very nature of such an attempt, it cannot surprise us that agreement as to any one article was no longer possible.¹

¹ Litterae Cardinalis Moguntini, in Rainaldus, 1541, No. 27.

² Anonymous, also in Rainaldus, No. 25. The side from which they came is obvious, from the fact that Eck is thus spoken of: "Unus duntaxat peritus theologus adhibitus est." "Nihil," they say, "ordinabitur pro robore ecclesiae, quia timetur illi (Caesari) displicere."

³ Beccatelli Vita, p. 119. "Hora il diavolo, che sempre alle buone opere s'attraversa, fece sì che sparsa questa fama della concordia che tra Catholici e Protestanti si preparava, gli invidi dell' imperatore in Germania e fuori, che la sua grandezza temevano, quando tutti gli Alemanni fossero stati uniti, cominciavano a seminare zizania tra quelli theologi collocatori."

Those who attribute the whole, or indeed the greater share of the blame attached to this failure to the Protestants, pass beyond the limits of justice. After a certain time, the pope announced his positive will to the legate, that neither in his official capacity, nor as a private person, should he tolerate any resolution in which the Catholic faith and opinions were expressed in words admitting the possibility of ambiguous acceptance. The formula in which Contarini had thought to reconcile the conflicting opinions as to the supremacy of the pope and the power of councils, was rejected at Rome unconditionally.² The legate was compelled to offer explanations that seemed in flagrant contradiction to his own previous words.

But, in order that the conference might not be altogether without result, the emperor desired that both parties would, for the present at least, abide by the articles mutually assented to, and that with regard to those still in dispute, each should tolerate the differences of the other; but neither Luther nor the pope could be moved to hear of this, and the cardinal was given to understand that the sacred college had resolved unanimously not to extend tolerance under any conditions whatever in regard to articles so vitally essential.

After hopes so inspiring, after a commencement so propitious, Contarini saw himself compelled to return without effecting any part of his purpose. He had wished to accompany the emperor to the Netherlands, but neither was this permitted to him. Returning to Italy, it was his lot to endure all the slanders touching his conduct, and the concessions he was charged with making to Protestantism, that had been circulated from Rome over the whole country. This was sufficiently vexatious, but he had a loftiness of mind that rendered the failure of plans so comprehensive, and so replete with good for all, still more grievous and more permanently painful to him.

¹ The Conference broke up, when the article concerning the Lord's Supper was reached. Contarini held fast to the idea of Transubstantiation; the Protestants, at a special meeting called for the purpose, decided not to accept it.

² Ardinghello a Contarini, 29 di Maggio, In Quirini, iii. 224.

How noble and impressive was the position that moderate Catholicism had assumed in his person! But, having failed in securing its benevolent and world-embracing designs, it now became a question whether it would even maintain its own existence. In every great tendency should reside the power of vindicating its own existence, of rendering itself effectual and respected; if it be not strong enough to secure this, if it cannot achieve the mastery, its doom is inevitable; it must sink into irremediable ruin.

3. NEW RELIGIOUS ORDERS

The minds of men had meanwhile become affected in another direction, in its origin not remote from that already indicated, but soon diverging from it; and though likewise seeking reform as its end, yet in a manner directly opposed to that adopted by Protestantism.

If the priesthood as heretofore existing had been repudiated by Luther in its very conception, and in every principle of its being, so was it as zealously upheld in its utmost extent by others, and a movement was at once made in Italy for its renovation and re-establishment in all its original force; in the hope that a more rigid observance of its tenour would restore it to the respect of the Church. Both parties were sensible to the decadence of ecclesiastical institutions; but while the Germans were content with nothing less than the abolition of monasticism, the Italians sought to restore and regenerate it. Whilst in Germany the churchman was throwing off so many of the restraints that had bound him, men were seeking in Italy to make these fetters yet more stringent. On this side the Alps a new path had been entered on; beyond them, attempts were repeated that had already been made from time to time throughout the lapse of ages.

There is no period in church history unprovided with examples of a decline towards worldly corruption in the monastic bodies, but, arrived at a certain point of decadence, they had appeared to recall their origin, and had returned to habits of a more blameless purity. The Carlovingsians even in their early day had found it needful to enforce the rule of Chrodegang on the clergy, compelling them to community of life, and to voluntary subordination. Nor did the simple rule of Benedict of Nursia long suffice to maintain order even among religious houses. During the 10th and 11th centuries, small secluded congregations, with special rules after the model of Cluny, were found to be requisite. This produced an instant effect on the secular clergy; by the enforcement of celibacy, they also, as before remarked, became in a manner subjected to the forms of monastic life. None the less, however, did corruption prevail; and, in spite of the powerful religious impulse given by the crusades to all Europe, an impulse so extensively influential that even the knights and nobles submitted their profession of war to the forms of monastic law, these institutions had sunk into the utmost decay, when the mendicant orders arose. On their first appearance, they doubtless did much to restore things to their primitive simplicity and severity; but we have seen how they too became gradually degenerate and tainted by the world's disorders, until at length the most glaring evidence of decadence in the Church might be found among these friars-mendicant.

From the year 1520, a conviction had been gaining ground through all those countries into which Protestantism had not yet penetrated, that reformation was deeply needed by the institutions of the hierarchy; this conviction became ever more and more confirmed as the new tenets made progress in Germany and elsewhere. It found place even amongst the orders themselves; sometimes appearing in one order, sometimes in another.

The extreme seclusion to which the order of Camaldoli was subjected, had not been able to preserve even this one; it was found by Paolo Giustiniani to partake largely of the general disorder. In the year 1522, he formed a new congregation of the same order, which received the name of Monte Corona, from the mountain on which its chief establishment was afterwards placed.¹ For the attainment of spiritual perfection, Giustiniani held three things to be essential: solitude, vows, and the separation of the monks into distinct cells. He alludes with special satisfaction in one of his letters to these little cells and oratories,² of which many may yet be found on the loftiest mountains, and niched amidst the beautiful wilds of nature; inviting the spirit at once to the most sublime aspirations and the deepest repose. The reforms effected by these hermits made themselves felt through the whole world.

Among the Franciscans, who were perhaps more deeply tainted than any, a new experiment of reform was made in addition to all that had been attempted before. The Capuchins determined on reviving the regulations of their founder,—the midnight service, the prayer at stated hours, the discipline and silence—the life imposed by their original institute, that is to say, in all the extremes of its austerity. We may be tempted to smile at the undue importance attached to mere trifles, but it cannot be questioned that these monks comported themselves on many occasions in compliance with all the rigour of their duties, as, for example, during the plague of 1528, when their courage and devotion were most exemplary.

Nothing of real value could, however, be effected by a reform of the monastic orders only, while the secular clergy were so utterly estranged from their vocation; a reformation, to be efficient, must affect them likewise.

And here we again encounter members of that Roman oratory before mentioned: two of these, men, as it would seem, of characters totally dissimilar in other respects, undertook to prepare the way for this needful reformation,—the one, Gaetano da Thiene, peaceful and retiring, of gentle manner and few words, disposed to the reveries of religious enthusiasm, and of whom it was said that he desired to reform the world, without permitting it to be known that he was in the world;¹ the other, Giovanni Pietro Caraffa, of whom we shall have further occasion to speak, turbulent, impetuous, and fiercely bigoted. But Caraffa also perceived, as he says himself, that his heart was only the more heavily oppressed the more it followed its own desires,—that peace could be found only by the resignation of the whole being to God, and in converse with heavenly things. Thus, these two men agreed in their desire for seclusion; the one from an instinct of his nature; the other impelled by yearnings after an ideal perfection; both were disposed to religious activity and, convinced that reform was needed, they combined to found an institution (since called the Order of Theatines), having for its objects at once the reformation of the clergy and a life of contemplation.²

¹ We may reasonably date the foundation from the drawing up of the rules, after Masacio was ceded to the new congregation in the year 1522. Basciano, the successor of Giustiniani, was the founder of Monte Corona. Helyot: Histoire des Ordres Monastiques, v. p. 271.

² Lettera del b. Giustiniano al Vescovo Teatino, in Brcmato, Storia di Paolo IV, lib. iii. § 19.

Gaetano belonged to the "protonotari partecipanti;" he at once resigned all emolument. Caraffa held the bishopric of Chieti and the archbishopric of Brindisi, but he renounced them both.³ In company with two intimate friends, also members of the oratory, they solemnly assumed the three vows on the 14th of September, 1524.⁴ To the vow of poverty they made the special addition that not only would they possess nothing, but would even abstain from begging, and await the alms that might be brought to their dwelling. After a short abode in the city, they withdrew to a small house on the Monte Pincio, near the Vigna Capisucchi,

¹ Caracciolus: Vita S. Cajetani Thienaei, c. iv. 101. "In conversatione humilis, mansuetus, modestus, pauci sermonis,—meminique me illum saepe vidisse inter precandum lacrymantem." He is very well described in the testimony of a pious society at Vicenza, which may be found in the same work, c. i. No. 12.

² Caracciolus, c. 2, § 19, declares their intention to be—"Clericis, quos ingenti populorum exitio improbitas inscitiaeque corrupissent, clericos alios debere suffici, quorum opera damnum quod illi per pravam exemplum intulissent sanaretur."

³ From a letter by the papal datary of Sept. 22nd, 1524, we have authentic proof that the pope long hesitated to accept the resignation, (non volendo privare quelle chiese di così buon pastore) [not wishing to deprive those churches of so good a pastor]. He yielded only to Caraffa's urgent entreaties.

⁴ The documents relating to this ceremony are to be found in the Commentarius praeuius, A.A. SS. Aug. ii. p. 249.

which afterwards became the Villa Medici. Here, though within the walls of Rome, there prevailed at that time a deep solitude, and in this place they lived amidst the privations of their self-imposed poverty, in spiritual exercises and in study of the Gospels. Of this the plan had been previously arranged, and it was repeated with great exactitude every month. They afterwards descended into the city to preach.

They did not call themselves monks, but regular clergy—they were priests with the vows of monks. Their intention was to establish a kind of seminary for the priesthood. By the charter of their foundation, they were expressly allowed to receive secular clergy. They did not originally adopt any prescribed colour or form of dress, leaving these to be determined by the local customs of their inmates; they suffered even the services of the Church to be performed everywhere according to the national usages; they were thus freed from many restraints under which monks laboured, expressly declaring that neither in the habits of life, nor in the service of the Church, should any mere custom be permitted to become binding on the conscience;¹ but on the other hand, they devoted themselves rigidly to their clerical duties—to preaching, the administration of the sacraments, and the care of the sick.

And now a custom that had long fallen into disuse among Italians, was again seen to prevail; priests appeared in the pulpit wearing the cross, the clerical cap and gown: at first this occurred principally in the oratory, but afterwards, when the wearers were proceeding on missions, in the streets also. Caraffa himself preached with all that exuberance of eloquence which remained his characteristic up to the last hour of his life. Together with his associates, for the most part men of noble birth, who might have possessed all the enjoyments of the world, he now began to visit the sick, whether in hospitals or private houses, and to wait by the pillow of the dying.

¹ Rule of the Theatines in Bromato: Vita di Paolo IV, lib. iii. § 25. "Nessuna consuetudine, nessun modo di vivere, o rito che sia, tanto di quelle cose, che spettano al culto divino, e in qualunque modo fannosi in chiesa, quanto di quelle, che pel viver commune in casa, e fuori da noi, si sogliono praticare, non permettiamo in veruna maniera, che acquistino vigore di precetto."

The best effects were produced by this return to the performance of clerical duties. The order of the Theatines did not indeed become a seminary for priests precisely, its numbers were never sufficient for that; but it grew to be a seminary for bishops, coming at length to be considered the order of priests peculiar to the nobility; and, as from the first the rule that all new members should be noble was sedulously observed, so demands for a proof of noble birth were afterwards occasionally made a condition to acceptance by this order. It will be readily understood that the original intention of living on alms, and yet refusing to beg, could not have been fulfilled except on these conditions.

The great point gained by all these efforts, meanwhile, was this, that the useful purpose of conjoining the clerical duties and consecration of the secular clergy with the vows of monks, gained extensive approval and imitation.

The North of Italy had been scourged by continual wars since the year 1521; these were followed of necessity by desolation, famine, and disease. How many children were here made orphans, and menaced by ruin both of body and soul! Happy is it for man that pity stands ever by the dwelling of misfortune. A Venetian senator, Girolamo Miani, collected such of these children as had come wanderers and fugitives to Venice, and sheltered them in his house; he sought them among the islands neighbouring to the city, and, giving slight heed to the clamours of his reluctant sister-in-law, he sold the plate and richest tapestries of his palace to procure shelter, food, clothing, and instruction for these destitute children. After a time his whole existence was devoted to this occupation. His success was very great, more especially in Bergamo: the hospital that he had founded there was so effectually supported, that he was encouraged to make similar experiments in other towns. In Verona, Brescia, Ferrara, Como, Milan, Pavia, and Genoa, hospitals of the same kind were by degrees established. Eventually, Miani associated himself with certain friends of like character, and formed a congregation of regular clergy, modelled on that of the Theatines, and called "di Somasca." Their principal occupation was to educate the poor: their hospitals received a constitution which was common to all.¹

Few cities have been so heavily visited by the horrors of war as Milan, exposed to repeated sieges, and captured now by one party, now by another. To mitigate the effect of these misfortunes by acts of mercy, to remedy the disorders and correct the barbarism consequent on these evils, by instruction, preaching, and example, was now the object proposed to themselves by Zaccaria, Ferrari, and Morigia, the three founders of the order of Barnabites. We learn from a Milanese chronicle, the surprise with which these new priests were at first regarded, as they passed through the streets in their homely garb and round cap—all still young, but with heads already bent in the earnestness of thought. Their dwelling-place was near the church of S. Ambrosio, where they lived in community. The countess Lodovica Torelli, who had sold her paternal inheritance of Guastalla, and devoted the money thus obtained to good works, was the chief support of this society.² The Barnabites had also the form of regular clergy.

The effect produced by these congregations, each in its separate circle, was doubtless very considerable; but, either from the exclusive end that they had proposed to themselves, as in the case of the Barnabites, or from the restriction of their means, as, by the very nature of their constitution, was inevitable in that of the poverty-vowed Theatines, they were incompetent to the carrying out of a deep-searching reform, and inadequate to the exercise of any widely extensive influence. Their existence is remarkable, because the voluntary character of their efforts betokens a tendency that largely contributed to the regeneration of Catholicism, but the force that was to stand against the bold advance of Protestantism, required to be of a totally different character.

¹ "Approbatio societatis tam ecclesiasticarum, quam secularium personarum, nuper institutae ad erigendum hospitalia pro subventionem pauperum orphanorum et mulierum convertitarum." Bull of Paul III, 5th June, 1540. Bullarium Cocquelines, iv. 173. It would appear, nevertheless, from the bull of Pius V, "Injunctum Nobis," 6th Dec. 1568, that the members of this congregation did not take their first vows till that date.

² Chronicle of Burigozzo in Custode: Continuation by Verri: Storia di Milano, vol. iv. p. 88.

This power was, however, approaching, and had already entered on a similar path, but the modes of its development were altogether unexpected, and in the highest degree peculiar.

4. IGNATIUS LOYOLA

The chivalry of Spain was the only one that had preserved a certain remnant of its religious character, down to the period before us. The war with the Moors, but just arriving at its conclusion in the Peninsula, and still proceeding in Africa; the vicinity of the subjugated Moriscoes still remaining, with whom the intercourse held by the victors was marked by the rancour characteristic of religious hatred; and the adventurous expeditions yet undertaken against infidels beyond the seas; all combined to perpetuate this spirit. In such books as the "Amadis de Gaul," full of a simple, enthusiastic loyalty and bravery, that spirit was idealized.

Don Iñigo Lopez de Recalde,¹ the youngest son of the house of Loyola, was born in a castle of that name, between Azpeitia and Azcoitia, in Guipuscoa. He was of a race that belonged to the noblest in the land,—"de parientes mayores,"—and its head claimed the right of being summoned to do homage by special writ. Educated at the court of Ferdinand the Catholic, and in the train of the duke of Najara, Iñigo was deeply imbued with the spirit of his nation and class. He aspired to knightly renown, and for none of his compatriots had the glitter of arms, the fame of valour, the adventures of single combat and of love, more attractive charms than for him; but he also displayed an extraordinary fervour of religious enthusiasm, and had already celebrated the first of the apostles, in a romance of chivalry, at this early period of his life.¹

¹ He is so called in judicial acts. How he became possessed of the name "Recalde," is not known, but this does not impugn its authenticity. Acta Sanctorum, 31 Julij. Commentarius praevious, p. 410.

It is, nevertheless, probable, that his name would have become known to us only as one of those many brave and noble Spanish leaders to whom the wars of Charles V gave opportunities so numerous for distinguishing themselves, had he not been wounded in both legs, at the defence of Pampe-luna against the French in 1521. Of these wounds he was never completely cured; twice were they reopened, and such was his fortitude, that, in these severe operations, the only sign of pain he permitted to escape him was the firm clenching of his hands. His sufferings were, unhappily, unavailing; the cure remained deplorably incomplete.

He was much versed in, and equally attached to, the romances of chivalry, more especially to the Amadis. During his long confinement he also read the life of Christ, and those of some of the saints.

Visionary by nature and excluded from a career that seemed to promise him the most brilliant fortunes, condemned to inaction, and at the same time rendered sensitive and excitable by his sufferings, he fell into the most extraordinary state of mind that can well be conceived. The deeds of St. Francis and St. Dominic, set forth by his favourite books in all the lustre of their saintly renown, not only seemed to him worthy of imitation, but, as he read, he believed himself possessed of the courage and strength required to follow in their footsteps, and to vie with them in austerity and self-denial.² It is true that these exalted purposes were sometimes chased by projects of a much more worldly character. Then would he picture himself repairing to the city where dwelt the lady to whose service he had devoted himself. "She was no countess," he said, "and no duchess, but of yet higher degree." The gay and graceful discourses with which he would address her, how he would prove his devotion, the knightly exploits he would perform in her honour; such were the fantasies between which his mind alternated.

¹ Maffei : Vita Ignatii.

² The Acta antiquissima, a Ludovico Consalvo ex ore Sancti excepta, AA. SS. LL., p. 634, gives very authentic information on the subject. The thought occurred to him once: "Quid, si ego hoc agerem quod fecit b. Franciscus, quid, si hoc quod b. Dominicus?" Again: "De muchas cosas vanas que se le ofrecian, una tenia": [Of many vain things that offered themselves to his mind, one he retained]—the honour that he meant to pay his lady. "Non era condesa ni duquesa mas era su estado mas alto que ninguno destas," a singularly frank and simple acknowledgment.

The more his recovery was protracted, and his hope of ultimate cure was deferred, the more also did the spiritual reverie gain ascendancy over the worldly vision. Shall we do him wrong, if we impute this result to the increased conviction that his former vigour could not be restored, that he could not hope again to shine in military service or the knightly career?

> Not that the transition was so abrupt, or to so opposite an extreme, as it might, on the first view, appear to be. In his spiritual exercises, the origin of which was coincident with the first ecstatic meditations of his awakened spirit, he imagines two camps, one at Jerusalem, the other at Babylon; the one belonging to Christ, the other to Satan; in the one is every thing good,—in the other, whatever is most depraved and vicious. These are prepared for combat. Christ is a king who has signified his resolve to subjugate all unbelievers; whoever would fight beneath his banners must be fed with the same food, and clad in like garments with him; he must endure the same hardships and vigils; according to the measure of his deeds, shall he be admitted to share in the victory and rewards. Before Christ, the Virgin, and the whole court of heaven, shall each man then declare that he will truly follow his Lord, and share with him in all adversities, and abide by him in true poverty of body and of spirit.¹

By these fanciful imaginations it probably was that his transition from the chivalry of arms to that of religion was facilitated; for it was indeed to a sort of spiritual knight-hood that his aspirations now tended, the ideal perfection of which was to consist in emulation of the achievements performed, and privations endured, by the saints. Tearing himself from home and kindred, he now sought the heights of Montserrat, not driven to this by remorse for his sins, nor impelled by any reality of religious feeling, but, as he has himself declared, merely by the desire of achieving deeds equally great with those to which the saints are indebted for their renown. His weapons and armour he hung up before an image of the Virgin; kneeling or standing in prayer, with his pilgrim's staff in his hand, he here passed the night, holding a vigil somewhat different from that of knighthood, but expressly suggested by the Amadis,¹ where all the rites proper to it are minutely described. The knightly dress in which he had arrived at Montserrat he gave away, assuming the coarse garb of the hermits, whose lonely dwellings are scooped among those naked rocks. After having made a general confession, he set off towards Jerusalem, not going direct to Barcelona, lest he should be recognized on the highways, but making a round by Manresa, whence, after new penances, he meant to gain his port of embarkation for the holy city.

¹ Exercitia spiritualia : secunda hebdomada. "Contemplatio regni Jesu Christi ex similitudine regis terreni subditos suos evocantis ad bellum;" and in other places.

But in Manresa he was met by other trials; the fantasies to which he had yielded himself, not so much from conviction as caprice, began here to assume the positive mastery. He devoted himself to the severest penances in the cell of a convent of Dominicans; he scourged himself thrice a day, he rose to prayer at midnight, and passed seven hours of each day on his knees.

He found these severities so difficult of practice that he greatly doubted his own ability to persevere in them for his whole life, but, what was still more serious, he felt that they did not bring him peace. He had spent three days on Montserrat in confessing the sins of all his past life; but, not satisfied with this, he repeated it in Manresa, recalling many faults before forgotten, nor permitting the most trifling errors to escape him; but the more laborious his exploration, so much the more painful became the doubts that assailed him. He did not believe that he would be either accepted by or justified before God. Having read in the works of the fathers that a total abstinence from food had once moved the compassion and obtained the mercy of the Almighty, he kept rigid fast from one Sunday to another, but his confessor forbade him to continue this attempt, and Iñigo, who placed the virtue of obedience above all others, desisted immediately; occasionally it appeared to him that his melancholy had been removed, falling away as does a heavy garment from the shoulders, but his former sufferings soon returned. His whole life seemed to him but one continuous series of sin after sin, and he not unfrequently felt tempted to throw himself from the window.¹

¹ Acta antiquissima: "cum mentem rebus iis refertam haberet quae ab Amadeo de Gaula conscriptae et ab ejus generis scriptoribus" (a strange mistake of the compiler, for Amadis is certainly not an author), "nonnullae illi similes occurrebant."

This relation cannot fail to remind us of the nearly similar sufferings endured by Luther some twenty years before, when he also was assailed by similar doubts. The great demand of religion, a perfect reconciliation with God, and its full assurance, could never be obtained in the ordinary manner prescribed by the Church, with such certainty as to satisfy the unfathomable longings of a soul at enmity with itself. But out of this labyrinth Ignatius and Luther escaped by very different paths; the latter attained to the doctrine of reconciliation through Christ without works; this it was that laid open to him the meaning of the Scriptures which then became his strong support; but of Loyola we do not find that he examined the Scriptures or became impressed by any particular dogma. Living in a world of internal emotion, and amid thoughts arising for ever within him, he believed himself subjected to the influence now of the good, and now of the evil spirit. He arrived finally at the power of distinguishing the inspirations of the one from those of the other, perceiving that the soul was cheered and comforted by the first, but harassed and exhausted by the latter.² One day he seemed to have awakened from a dream, and thought he had tangible evidence that all his torments were assaults of Satan. He resolved to resign all examination of his past life from that hour, to open those wounds no more, never again to touch them. This was not so much the restoration of his peace as a resolution; it was an engagement entered into by the will rather than a conviction to which the submission of the will is inevitable. It required no aid from Scripture, it was based on the belief he entertained of an immediate connection between himself and the world of spirits. This would never have satisfied Luther. No inspirations—no visions would Luther admit; all were in his opinion alike injurious. He would have the simple, written, indubitable word of God alone. Loyola, on the contrary, lived wholly in fantasies and inward apparitions; the person best acquainted with Christianity was, as he thought, an old woman, who had told him, in the worst of his mental anguish, that Christ would yet appear to him in person. For some time this was not clear to him; but at length he believed that he had not only the Saviour in person before his eyes, but the Virgin Mother also. One day he stood weeping aloud on the steps of the church of S. Domenico, at Manresa, because he believed himself to see the mystery of the Trinity at that moment standing before his sight.¹ He spoke of nothing else through the whole day, and was inexhaustible in similes and comparisons respecting it. Suddenly also the mystery of the creation was made visible to him in mystic symbols. In the host he beheld the God and the man. Proceeding once along the banks of the Llobregat to a distant church, he sat down and bent his eyes earnestly on the deep stream before him, when he was suddenly raised into an ecstasy wherein the mysteries of the faith were visibly revealed to him. He believed himself to rise up a new man. Thenceforth neither testimony nor Scripture was needful to him; had none such beginning of which is referred by himself to the fancies of his illness. At Manresa it became a certainty. It is much developed in the "Spiritual Exercises," wherein are found especial rules: "ad motus animae quos diversi excitant spiritus discernendos, ut boni solum admitantur, et pellantur mali."

¹ Maffei, Ribadeneira, Orlandinus and all his other biographers describe these struggles; but more authentic than all are the writings of Ignatius himself on this subject: the following passage, for example, clearly depicts his condition: "Cum his cogitationibus agigaretur, tentabatur saepe graviter magno cum impetu, ut magno ex foramine quod in cellula erat sese dejiceret. Nec aberat foramen ab eo loco ubi preces fundebat. Sed cum videret esse peccatum se ipsum occidere, rursus clamabat: 'Domine, non faciam quod te offendat.'"

² One of his most peculiar and most original perceptions, the

¹ En figura de tres teclas. [Figured by three keys of a musical instrument.]

existed he would have gone without hesitation to death for the faith which he had before believed, but which he now saw with his eyes.¹

If we have clearly comprehended the origin and development of this most peculiar state of mind, of this chivalry of abstinence, this pertinacity of enthusiasm, and fantastic asceticism, we shall not need to follow Iñigo Loyola through every step of his progress. He did, in fact, proceed to Jerusalem, in the hope of confirming the faith of the believer as well as that of converting the infidel. But how was this last purpose to be accomplished, uninstructed as he was, without associates, without authority? Even his intention of remaining in the Holy Land was frustrated by an express prohibition from the heads of the church at Jerusalem, who had received from the pope the privilege of granting or refusing permissions of residence there. Returning to Spain he had further trials to encounter, being accused of heresy on attempting to teach and inviting others to participate in those spiritual exercises on which he had now entered. It would have been an extraordinary sport of destiny, if Loyola, whose Society, centuries later, ended in Illuminati, had himself been associated with a sect of that name;² and it is not to be denied that the Spanish Illuminati of that day—the Alumbrados—did hold opinions bearing some analogy to his fantasies. They had rejected the doctrine then taught in Christendom, of salvation by works, like him they gave themselves up to ecstasies, and believed, as he did, that they beheld religious mysteries, above all that of the Trinity, in immediate and visible revelation. They made general confession a condition to absolution, and insisted earnestly on the necessity for inward prayer, as did Loyola and his followers of later times. I would not venture to affirm that Loyola was entirely untouched by these opinions, but neither would I assert that he belonged to the sect of Alumbrados. The most striking distinction between them and him is, that whereas they believed themselves to be exalted by the claims of the spirit above all the common duties of life, he, on the contrary, still impressed by his early habits, placed the soldier's virtue, obedience, before all others; his every conviction and whole enthusiasm of feeling he compelled himself to place in subjection to the Church and to all who were invested with her authority.

¹ Acta antiquissima: "his visis haud mediocriter tum confirmatus est" (the original has, "y le dieron tanta confirmacion siempre de la fe") "ut saepe etiam id cogitarit, quod etsi nulla scriptura mysteria illa fidei doceret, tamen ipse ob ea ipsa quae viderat, statueret sibi pro his esse moriendum."

² This charge was made against Lainez and Borgia also. Llorente, Hist. de l'Inquisition, iii. 83. Melchior Cano calls them plainly Illuminati, the gnostics of the age.

These troubles and obstacles had meanwhile a decisive influence on his future life; in the circumstances in which he then was, without learning or profound theological knowledge, and without political support, his existence must have passed and left no trace. The utmost effect he would have produced would have been the conversion of some two or three Spaniards. But being enjoined, by the universities of Alcalá and Salamanca, to study theology for four years before attempting again to expound or teach the more obscure points of doctrine, he was compelled to enter on a path which gradually led him forward to an unexpected field for the exertion of his religious activity.

He proceeded then to Paris, which at that time was the most celebrated university of the world.

The studies were peculiarly difficult for him; he had to pass through the class of grammar (on which he had entered in Spain), and that of philosophy, before he could be admitted to the study of theology;¹ but his grammatical inflections and the analysis of logical forms were alike interrupted by, and intermingled with the ecstasies of those profound religious thoughts with which he had been accustomed to connect them. There was something of magnanimity in his at once declaring these aberrations to be occasioned by the evil spirit, who was seeking to lure him from the right way: he subjected himself to the most rigorous discipline in the hope of combating them.

¹ From the oldest chronicle of the Jesuits, Chronicon Breve, A.A. SS. LL. p. 525, we learn that Ignatius was in Paris from 1528 to 1535: "Ibi vero non sine magnis molestiis et persecutionibus primo grammaticae de integro, tum philosophiae ac demum theologico studio sedulam operam navavit,"

But though his studies now opened a new world to his gaze—the world of reality—he did not for a moment depart from his religious intentions, nor fail to share them with others. It was indeed at this time that he effected those first conversions, by which the future world was destined to be so powerfully and permanently influenced.

Of the two companions who shared the rooms of Loyola in the college of St. Barbara, one, Peter Faber, a Savoyard, proved an easy conquest; growing up among his father's flocks, he had one night devoted himself solemnly, beneath the canopy of heaven, to study and to God. He went through the course of philosophy with Ignatius (the name that Loyola bore among foreigners), and the latter communicated to him his own ascetic principles. Ignatius taught his young friend to combat his faults, prudently taking them not altogether, but one by one, since there was always some virtue to the possession of which he should more especially aspire. He kept him strictly to confession and to frequent participation of the Lord's Supper. They lived in the closest intimacy. Ignatius received alms in tolerable abundance from Spain and Flanders, and these he constantly divided with Faber. His second companion, Francis Xavier of Pampelona, in Navarre, was by no means so easily won; his most earnest ambition was to ennoble still further the long series of his ancestors, renowned in war during five hundred years, by adding to their names his own, rendered illustrious by learning. He was handsome and rich, possessed high talent, and had already gained a footing at court. Ignatius was careful to show him all the respect to which he laid claim, and to see that others paid it also. He procured him a large audience for his first lectures, and, having begun by these personal services, his influence was soon established by the natural effect of his pure example and imposing austerity of life. He at length prevailed on Xavier, as he had done on Faber, to join him in spiritual exercises. He was by no means indulgent; three days and three nights did he compel them to fast. During the severest winters, when carriages were crossing the frozen Seine, he would not permit Faber the slightest relaxation of discipline. He finished by making these two young men entirely his own, and shared with them his most intimate thoughts and feelings.¹

How full of mighty import was that little cell of St. Barbara, uniting as it did these three men, who there formed plans and devised enterprises, inspired by their visionary and enthusiastic ideas of religion ; and that were to lead, they themselves could have no conception whither.

Let us examine the more important features in the development of this association. After having gained over certain other Spaniards, to whom Ignatius had rendered himself indispensable either by good counsels or other aid, as Salmeron, Lainez, and Bobadilla, they proceeded one day to the church of Montmartre. Faber, who was already in orders, said the mass. They took the vow of chastity, and swore to proceed to Jerusalem, after the completion of their studies, there to live in poverty, and dedicate their days to the conversion of the Saracens. Or, should they find it impossible to reach that place, or to remain there, they were next to offer their services to the pope, agreeing to go whithersoever he might assign them their labours, without condition and without reward. Having taken this oath, each received the host, which Faber also instantly took himself. This completed, they proceeded in company to a repast at the fountain of St. Denis.

Here we see a league formed between enthusiastic young men, and of which the purposes were absolutely unattainable, still in accordance with the original ideas of Ignatius, or departing from them only so far as, on a calculation of probabilities, they might find themselves unable to carry them into effect.

In the beginning of the year 1537, we find them in effect assembled in Venice, with three other companions, prepared for the commencement of their pilgrimage. We have already observed many changes in the fortunes of Loyola ; from a military knighthood we have seen him pass to a religious chivalry ; we have marked his subjection to the most violent mental conflicts, and have seen him force his way through them by the aid of a visionary asceticism ; formed by heavy labours, he became a theologian and the founder of a fanatical society, and now at length his purposes assumed their final and permanent character. His departure for Jerusalem was deferred by the war just then commencing between Venice and the Turks, and the prospect of his intended pilgrimage was rendered more remote ; but the institution of the Theatines, with which he became acquainted in Venice, may be said to have first opened his eyes to his true vocation. For some time Ignatius lived in the closest intimacy with Caraffa, taking up his abode in the convent of Theatines, which had been established in Venice. He served in the hospitals which Caraffa superintended, and wherein he exercised his novices, but, not entirely content with the institution of the Theatines, he proposed to Caraffa certain changes in its mode of action, and this is said to have caused the dissolution of their intimacy.¹ But even these facts make it obvious that a deep impression had been produced on him by that society ; he there saw an order of priests devoting themselves zealously and strictly to their true clerical duties. Should he, as seemed ever more probable, remain on this side the Mediterranean, and find the scene of his activity in Western Christendom, he perceived clearly that this must be his course also, if he would turn his labours to the best advantage.

¹ Orlandinus, who likewise wrote a Life of Faber which I have not seen, is more circumstantial on this point also (in his great work Historia Societatis Jesu, pars i. p. 17) than is Ribadeneira.

In pursuit of this conviction, he took priest's orders in Venice, with all his companions ; and, after forty days of prayer, he began to preach in Vicenza, together with three others of his society. On the same day and at the same hour, they appeared in different streets, mounted on stones, waved their hats, and with loud cries exhorted the people to repentance.

Preachers of a very unwonted aspect were these ; their clothing in rags, their looks emaciated, and their language a mixture of Spanish and Italian well nigh unintelligible ; they remained in this neighbourhood until the year had expired during which they had resolved to delay their journey to Rome ; they then proceeded thither.¹

¹ Sacchinus, "cujus sit auctoritatis, quod in b. Cajetani Thienaci vita de beato Ignatio traditur," discusses all the particulars of this intimacy.

Having determined to make this journey by different roads, they were now about to separate; but first they established certain rules by means of which they might observe a fixed uniformity of life, even when apart; next came the question what reply should be made to those who might inquire their profession? They pleased themselves with the thought of making war as soldiers against Satan, and in accordance with the old military propensities of Loyola, they assumed the name of the Company of Jesus, exactly as a company of soldiers takes the name of its captain.¹

Their situation in Rome was in the first instance by no means free from difficulty. Ignatius thought he saw every door closed against them, and they had also once more to defend themselves from suspicions of heresy; but no long time had elapsed before the mode of their lives, with their zeal in preaching, instructing youth, and tending the sick, attracted numerous adherents, and so many shewed a disposition to join them, that they felt themselves in a condition to prepare for a formal institution of their society.

They had already taken two vows, they now assumed the third, that of obedience; but as this had been ever held by Loyola to be the first of virtues, so they desired to surpass all other orders in that particular. It was already going very far to elect, as they resolved to do, their general for life; but even this did not satisfy them. They superadded the special obligation "to perform whatsoever the reigning pontiff should command them, to go forth into all lands, among Turks, heathens, or heretics, wherever he might please to send them, without hesitation or delay, without question, condition, or reward."

How entirely is all this in contrast to the tendency hitherto manifested by that period! Whilst from every other side the pope met only opposition or defection, and had only continued desertions to expect: here was a body of men, earnest, enthusiastic, and zealous, uniting to devote themselves exclusively to his service; there could be no hesitation in such a case for the pontiff. In the year 1540, he gave his sanction to their institute, at first with certain restrictions, but afterwards, in 1543, the Society of Jesus was absolutely and unconditionally established.

¹ Ribadeneira, Vita brevior, c. 12, declares that Ignatius chose this title—"ne de suo nomine diceretur." Nigroni expounds the word societas—"Quasi dicas cohortem aut centuriam quae ad pugnam cum hostibus spiritualibus conserendam conscripta sit." "Postquam nos vitamque nostram Christo D^{no}. nostro et ejus vero ac legitimo vicario in terris obtuleramus." In the Deliberatio Primorum Patrum, AA. SS. LL. p. 463.

And now its members also made their final arrangements; six of the oldest associates met to choose their president, who, according to the first sketch of their plan presented to the pope, "should dispense offices and grades at his own pleasure, should form the rules of their constitution, with the advice and aid of the members, but should alone have the power of commanding in every instance, and should be honoured by all as though Christ himself were present in his person." The choice fell unanimously on Ignatius, "to whom," as Salmeron expressed it in the letter declaring his assent, "they were all indebted for their birth in Christ and for the milk of the word."¹

At length then, the Society of Jesus had acquired its form. This association also was a company of clerks regular, its duties were likewise a combination of the clerical and monastic, but the members were nevertheless broadly distinguished from those of other congregations.

The Theatines had freed themselves from many of the less important obligations of conventual life, but the Jesuits went much further,² they dispensed entirely with the monastic habit, exempted themselves from all those devotional exercises in common, by which so much time is occupied in convents, and from the obligation to sing in the choir.

Exempted from these less important practices, they devoted all their energies and every hour of their lives to the essential duties of their office; not to one only, as did the Barnabites, although they attended sedulously to the sick as one measure towards acquiring a good name; nor with the restrictions that fettered the Theatines; but to all the greater duties equally, and with whatever force they could command. First to preaching: before separating in Vicenza, they had mutually agreed to preach chiefly for the common people, to think more of making an impression on their hearers, than of shining themselves by display of eloquence, and to this system they adhered. Secondly to confession: for by this they were to hold the immediate guidance and government of consciences. The spiritual exercises by which they had themselves become united with Ignatius afforded them important aid. Finally, they devoted themselves to the education of youth: they had intended to bind themselves to this last by a special clause in their vows; and although they had not done so, yet the practice of this duty was made imperative by the most stringent rules; to gain the rising generation was among the purposes most earnestly pursued. They laid aside, in short, all secondary matters, devoting themselves wholly to such labours as were essential, of immediate result, and calculated for the extension of their influence.

¹ Suffragium Salmeronis.

² This they consider the difference between themselves and the Theatines. Didacus Payva Andradius: Orthodoxarum Explicatt. lib. i. fol. 14: "Illi (Theatini) sacrarum aeternarumque rerum meditationi psalmodiaque potissimum vacant: isti vero (Jesuitae) cum divinorum mysteriorum assidua contemplatione, docendae plebis, evangelii amplificandi, sacramenta administrandi, atque reliqua omnia apostolica munera conjungunt."

Thus was a system pre-eminently practical evolved from the visionary aspirations of Ignatius; and from the ascetic conversions he had made, there resulted an institution, framed with all the skilful adaptation of means to their end which the most consummate worldly prudence could suggest.

His most sanguine hopes were now more than fulfilled. He held the uncontrolled direction of a society, among whose members his own peculiar views found cordial acceptance, and wherein the religious convictions at which he had arrived by accident or the force of his genius, were made the object of profound study, and the venerated basis and guide of belief. His plan relating to Jerusalem was not, indeed, to be carried out, for nothing useful could now be obtained by it; but in other directions the company he ruled went forth on the most remote, and above all, most successful missions. The care of souls, which he had so earnestly enforced, was entered on with a zeal that he could not have hoped for, and to an extent surpassing his highest anticipations. And lastly, he was himself the object of an implicit obedience, combining that of the soldier to his captain with that of the priest to his spiritual chief.

But before we further describe the practical efficiency and widely-spread influence attained by the Company of Jesus, let us investigate one of the most important causes contributing to their successful progress.

5. FIRST SITTINGS OF THE COUNCIL OF TRENT

The interests by which the emperor was moved to the demand of a council are already before us, together with those inclining the pope to avoid and refuse it. There was, however, one point of view in which an assembly of the Church might be considered desirable even by the pontiff,—that the doctrines of the Catholic church might be inculcated with unwavering zeal, and successfully extended, it was essential to remove the doubts existing in the bosom of the Church itself, touching more than one of its tenets. The authority to do this effectually was exclusively vested in a council; an important consideration for the pope, therefore, was the choice of a time when it might be held in favourable circumstances and under his own influence.

That eventful moment in which the two religious parties had become more nearly approximate than at any other period, on the ground of a moderate opinion, taking a medium between both creeds, was also decisive of this question. We have remarked that the pope believed he saw symptoms of an intention on the part of the emperor himself to call a council. At this moment, then, assured from all sides of adherence from the Catholic princes, he lost no time in anticipating the imperial purpose. The movements we have before described were still proceeding when the pontiff resolved to interpose no further delay, but at once take steps for the œcumenic assembling of the Church.¹ He made known his intention at first to

¹ Ardinghella al Cl Contarini, 15 Giugno, 1541, in Quirini, iii. ccxvi. : “Considerato che nè la concordia a Christiani è successa e la tolerantia” (proposed at Ratisbon, but rejected by the consistory of the

Contarini, and through him to the emperor : the negotiations proceeded with earnest purpose ; the pope's letters of convocation were issued, and in the following year we find his legates already at Trent.¹

Again, however, new obstacles presented themselves ; the number of bishops who appeared was not sufficient. The times were too deeply involved in war ; nor was the state of things generally altogether favourable. It was not until December, 1545, that the opening of the council actually took place : then, indeed, the old loiterer, Time, did at length bring the wished-for moment.

For when could one occur more propitious than that when the emperor, threatened by the progress of Protestantism, in his imperial dignity, as it appeared to him, and in the government of his dominions, had determined to resort to arms. Since he would require the aid of the pope, he could not venture now to assert those claims which he was believed to intend bringing forward in a council. By the war he would be kept entirely occupied ; the power of the Protestants made it impossible to foresee the extent of embarrassments in which he might become involved ; he would thus be in no condition to press too earnestly for those reforms with which he had so long been threatening the papal throne. The pope had, besides, another method of baffling his purposes : the emperor demanded that the council should begin with the subject of reform, but the papal legates carried a resolution that reform and the dogmas of the Church should be treated together ;² in effect, however, the discussion of the dogmas was that first entered on.

cardinals) è illecitissima e dannosa, e la guerra difficile e pericolosa : para a S.S. che si ricorra al rimedio del concilio. . . Adunque—S. Beatitudine ha determinato di levar via la prorogatione della suspensione del concilio, e di dichiararlo e congregarlo quanto piu presto si potrà.” [It being considered that no agreement has been made among Christians, that toleration is most illicit and hurtful, and war very dangerous and difficult, his holiness has determined to resort to the remedy of a council : he will therefore now have the suspension removed, and will declare and assemble such council at the first moment possible.]

¹ They arrived on the 22nd of Nov. 1542.

² An expedient suggested by Thomas Campeggio, Pallavicini, vi. 7, 5 ; for the rest, a bull concerning reform had been prepared in

Again, the pope not only succeeded in averting whatever might have been injurious to his interests, but contrived to secure all that could be turned to his advantage; the establishment of the disputed doctrines was to him of the very first importance, as we have shewn: it was now to be decided whether any of those opinions, tending towards the creed of the Protestants, could hold a place within the limits of the Catholic faith.

In the first instance (for proceedings were very systematically arranged) revelation itself was discussed, with the sources whence our knowledge of it is to be derived; and even at this early stage, voices were raised in favour of opinions tending towards Protestantism. Bishop Nachianti of Chiozza would hear of nothing but Scripture; he maintained that in the Gospel was written whatever was necessary to salvation; but he had an overwhelming majority against him, and the resolution was adopted, that the unwritten traditions, received from the mouth of Christ, and transmitted to the latest ages under the guardianship of the Holy Spirit, were to be regarded with reverence equal to that paid to the Scriptures. In respect to these last, no reference was made to the original text. The Vulgate was declared the authentic translation, but a promise was given that for the future it should be printed with the most scrupulous care.¹

The foundation of their work thus laid (and it was said with good reason that half the business was thereby accomplished), the speakers proceeded to the great and decisive article of justification and the doctrines connected with it. To this portion of the controversy the principal interest was attached.

Among the members of this council there were many who held opinions on this point entirely similar to those of the Protestants. The archbishop of Siena, the bishop the beginning, but it was never published. Bulla Reformationis Pauli Papae III concepta non vulgata: primum edidit H. N. Clausen. Havn. 1829.

¹ Conc. Tridentii, sessio IV.: "In publicis lectionibus, disputationibus, praedicationibus et expositionibus, pro authentica habeatur." It was to be printed in an amended form, posthac, not exactly as Pallavicini says, "quanto si potesse più tosto;" vi. 15, 2.

della Cava, Giulio Contarini, bishop of Belluno, and with them five theologians, ascribed justification solely and wholly to the merits of Christ and to faith; charity and hope they declared to be the attendants, and works the proof of faith, but nothing more,—the basis of justification must be faith alone.

How could it be expected, at a moment when pope and emperor were attacking the Protestants with force of arms, that their primal doctrine—that on which the whole existence of their creed was founded—should be received as valid by a council assembled under the auspices of these two powers? It was in vain that Pole exhorted them not to reject an opinion simply because it was held by Luther; too much of bitter and personal animosity was connected with this tenet; the bishop della Cava and a Greek monk proceeded to actual violence against each other. It was seen that the council could not even debate to any purpose, on so unequivocal an expression of Protestant opinion: the discussions were confined—and even this was a great point gained—to the intermediate system propounded by Gaspar Contarini and his friends.

Seripando, the general of the Augustinians, advanced this doctrine, but not without the express declaration that he was upholding no tenet of Luther, but rather those of his most renowned opponents, as Pflug and Gropper: justification, he contended, was twofold¹—the one inherent in us, indwelling, and that through which, from children of sin, we become children of God. But this also is of free grace, and unmerited; it becomes manifest in virtues, and is active in works, but not of itself capable of conducting us to the glory of God. The other is the righteousness and merits of Christ imparted and attributed to us; this atones for all our sins—it is perfect and equal to our salvation. Thus was it that Contarini had taught: “If we make question,” he remarks, “as to which of these justifications we must rely on—that indwelling or that imparted through Christ—the devout man will reply, that we must confide in the latter only. Our own righteousness is incomplete and ineffective, marred by its deficiencies—that of Christ alone is true and sufficient; this only is entirely pleasing in the sight of God, and in virtue of this alone may we trust to be justified before God.”¹

¹ Parere data a 13 di Luglio, 1544. Extracted from Pallavicini, viii. 11, 4.

But even thus modified, leaving as they did the essentials of Protestant doctrine unharmed; so that its adherents might have sanctioned the change, these tenets encountered the most violent opposition.

Caraffa, who had already opposed the Protestant tendency when it appeared at Ratisbon, had now his place among those cardinals to whom the control of the council of Trent was intrusted. He brought forward a treatise of his own on the subject of justification, and in this he contended eagerly against all such opinions as those upheld by the moderate party.² Already the Jesuits had assumed a position by his side; Salmeron and Lainez had secured the advantageous privilege of addressing the assembly; the one at the commencement, the other at the close of its sittings: each possessed learning and ability, was fired with zeal, and in the bloom of life. Enjoined by Ignatius to commit themselves to no opinion approaching to innovation on the doctrines of the Church,³ they combated the tenets of Seripando with their utmost force. Lainez appeared on the field of controversy with an entire volume, rather than a mere reply; he had the majority of the theologians on his side.

The distinction drawn between the two kinds of justification was left unquestioned by these disputants, but they affirmed that the imputed righteousness became involved in the inherent, or that Christ's merits were immediately ascribed and imparted to man through faith ; that we must by all means place our reliance on the merits of Christ, not because these merits complete, but because they produce our own. This was precisely the point on which all turned, for as, according to Contarini and Seripando, the merits of works could avail nothing, so by this view of the case was their efficacy restored. The old doctrine of the schoolmen taught, that the soul, clothed with grace, merits for itself eternal life.¹ The archbishop of Bitonto, one of the most learned and eloquent of these fathers, distinguished between a previous justification, dependent on the merits of Christ, by which the sinner is rescued from the state of reprobation ; and a subsequent justification, worked out by our own righteousness, dependent on the grace imputed to, and dwelling in us : in this sense, the bishop of Fano declares faith to be but the gate of justification, where we must not stand still, but must traverse the whole course.

¹ Contarini, Tractatus de Justificatione. But the reader must not, as I did at first, consult the Venice edition of 1589, where this passage will be sought in vain. In 1571 the Sorbonne had approved the treatise as it stood; in the Paris edition of that year it is given unmutated. In 1589, on the contrary, the inquisitor-general of Venice, Fra Marco Medici, refused to permit its appearance; and, not satisfied by the omission of condemned passages, he so altered them as to bring them into harmony with the Catholic tenets. We are amazed on finding the collection in Quirini (Epp. Poli, iii. 213). These instances of unjustifiable violence must be remembered, if we wish to explain so bitter a hatred as that cherished by Paul Sarpi.

² Bromato: Vita di Paolo IV., tom. ii. p. 131.

³ Orlandinus, vi. p. 127.

However closely these opinions may appear to approximate, they are in fact diametrically opposed to each other ; the Lutheran doctrine does indeed assert the necessity of inward regeneration, points out the way to salvation, and declares that good works must follow ; but it maintains that the divine grace proceeds from the merits of Christ. The council of Trent, on the contrary, admits the merits of Christ, it is true, but attributes justification to these merits only so far as they promote regeneration, and thereby good works, on which, as a final result, this council makes all depend. "The sinner," it declares,² "is justified, when through the merits of the most holy passion, and through the operation of the sacred Spirit, the love of God is implanted in his heart and abides in it ; thus become the friend of God, man goes forward from virtue to virtue, and becomes renewed from day to day ; whilst he walks by the commandments of God and the Church, he grows with the help of faith through good works, in the righteousness obtained through the grace of Christ, and becomes more and more justified."

¹ Chemnitius : Examen Concilii Tridentini, i. 355.

² Sessio VI., c. vii. 10.

And thus were the Protestant opinions altogether excluded from Catholicism ; all mediation was utterly rejected. This occurred precisely at the moment when the emperor was victorious in Germany, the Lutherans were submitting in almost every direction, and preparations were being made to subdue those who still hoped to hold out. The advocates of moderate views, Cardinal Pole and the archbishop of Siena, had already quitted the council, but as might be expected, under different pretexts ;¹ instead of guiding and moderating the faith of others, they had cause to fear, lest their own should be assailed and condemned.

The most important difficulty was thus overcome ; since justification is progressive in the heart of man, and undergoes continual development, the sacraments are manifestly indispensable ; for by these it is begun, or if begun is continued, or when lost is recovered.² The whole seven might then all be retained without difficulty as heretofore, and their origin referred to the Author of the Faith, since the institutions of Christ's church were communicated, not by scripture only, but also by tradition.³ Now these sacraments embrace the whole life of man as we know well ; in every stage of its progress, they represent the true power of the hierarchy ; by these does she rule every day and hour of the layman's existence, since they are not the types of grace only, they impart grace, completing thus the mystical relation in which man is believed to stand with God.

Therefore it is that tradition was received, because the Holy Ghost abides perpetually in the Church ; and the Vulgate, because the Romish church has by special grace been kept wholly free from error. It is in harmony with this indwelling of the divine element, that the justifying principle should also have its abode in man ; -that the grace bound up in the visible sacrament should be imparted to him step by step, embracing his whole life, and holding full possession to, and of, the hour of his death. The visible Church is at the same time the true Church, which has been called the invisible. Beyond her own pale no religious existence can be acknowledged.

¹ It was at least a strange coincidence, if both were prevented, as is said, by the accident of sudden illness, from returning to Trent. Polo ai C^{te}. Monte e Cervini, 15 Sept. 1546. Epp. tom. iv. p. 189. The opinions maintained by Pole were greatly injurious to that prelate.—Mendoza al Emperador Carlos, 13 July, 1547. "Lo Cardinal de Inglaterra le haze danno lo que se a dicho de la justificacion."

² Sessio VII., Prooemium.

³ Sarpi gives the discussions on this point : Historia del Concilio Tridentino, p. 241. (Edition of 1629.) Pallavicini's account is very insufficient.

6. THE INQUISITION

Time had not been lost in the meanwhile, measures having already been adopted for the suppression of the Protestant doctrines, and for the careful dissemination of those they had sought to subvert.

And here we must once more look back to the time of the Ratisbon conference. When it became obvious that no conclusion could be arrived at with the professors of the new tenets ; and that even in Italy disputes had arisen concerning the sacraments, while doubts as regarded purgatory and other points of great moment in the Roman ritual were rife among the people, the pope one day inquired of Cardinal Caraffa, "what remedy could be devised for these evils?" The cardinal replied, that a thoroughly searching inquisition was the only efficient one, and his opinion was supported by that of Juan Alvarez de Toledo, cardinal of Burgos.

The old Dominican Inquisition had long fallen to decay. The choice of inquisitors was committed to the monastic orders, and it sometimes happened that these men partook of the very opinions that they were appointed to suppress. The primitive form had been so far departed from in Spain, that a supreme tribunal of the Inquisition had been established for that country. Caraffa and Burgos were both old Dominicans, zealots for the purity of Catholicism, holding stern and gloomy views of moral rectitude, in their own lives rigidly austere, and immoveable in their opinions ; these men advised the pope to establish a supreme tribunal of the Inquisition in Rome, universal in its jurisdiction, and on which all others should depend. "As St. Peter," exclaimed Caraffa, "subdued the first heresiarchs in no other place than Rome, so must the successors of Peter destroy all the heresies of the whole world in Rome."¹ The Jesuits account it among the glories of their order, that their founder, Loyola, supported this proposition by a special memorial. The bull was published on the 21st of July, 1542.

By this edict six cardinals were appointed Commissioners of the Apostolic See, and Inquisitors general and universal in matters of faith on both sides the Alps, Caraffa and Toledo being the first among them. These cardinals were invested with the right of delegating similar power to ecclesiastics, in all such places as should seem good to them, as also of determining all appeals against the acts of these delegates, even without the intervention of the ordinary ecclesiastical courts. All were subjected to their authority without distinction of rank or person,—no station or dignity was to be exempt. The suspected were at once to be thrown into prison, the guilty to be punished by loss of life and confiscation of property. One restriction only was imposed on the power of these men; they were at liberty to inflict punishment, but the right of pardon was reserved by the pope to himself; they might condemn heretics without restraint, but to absolve those once condemned was in the power of the pope only. Thus were they to proceed, enforcing and executing whatever might most effectually suppress and uproot the errors that had found place in the Christian community, and permitting no vestige of them to remain.²

Caraffa lost not a moment in carrying this edict into execution; he would have thought it waste of time to wait for the usual issue of means from the apostolic treasury, and though by no means rich, he hired a house for immediate proceedings at his own expense; this he fitted up with rooms for the officers, and prisons for the accused ; supplying the latter with strong bolts and locks, with dungeons, chains, blocks, and every other fearful appurtenance of his office. He appointed commissioners-general for the different countries. Teofilo di Tropea, his own chaplain, was the first of those named for Rome, so far as I have been able to discover, and of this man's severity, many cardinals, among whom was Pole, had afterwards grievous experience.

¹ Bromato: Vita di Paolo IV, lib. vii. § 3.

² "Licet ab initio." Deputatio nonnullorum S. R. E. Cardinalium Generalium Inquisitorum haereticae pravitatis, 21 Julii, 1542. Cocquelines, iv. i. 211.

The manuscript life of Caraffa gives the following rules ¹ as drawn up by Caraffa himself ; and as being "the best he could devise for promoting the end in view" : —

"First. When the faith is in question, there must be no delay ; but at the slightest suspicion, rigorous measures must be resorted to with all speed.

"Secondly. No consideration to be shewn to any prince or prelate, however high his station.

"Thirdly. Extreme severity is rather to be exercised against those who attempt to shield themselves under the protection of any potentate : only he who makes plenary confession shall be treated with gentleness and fatherly compassion.

"Fourthly. No man must debase himself by shewing toleration towards heretics of any kind, above all towards Calvinists."

It will be remarked that all is severity, inflexible and remorseless ; till confession has been wrung out no mercy may be hoped for. A fearful state of things ; and then more especially so when opinions were not well fixed or fully developed, and many were seeking to conciliate the more profound doctrines of Christianity with the institutions of the existing church. The weaker resigned themselves and submitted ; those of firmer character, on the contrary, now first decidedly attached themselves to the proscribed opinions, and sought to withdraw from the violence threatening them.

¹ Caracciolo : Vita di Paolo IV, MS., c. 8. "Haveva egli queste infra scritte regole tenute da lui come assiomi verissimi : la prima, che in materia di fede non bisogna aspettar punto, ma subito che vi è qualche sospetto o indicio di peste heretica, far ogni sforzo e violenza per estirparla," etc.

One of the first among these was Bernardino Ochino. It had for some time been remarked that his conventual duties were performed with less zeal than he had formerly displayed. In the year 1542, his hearers became dissatisfied with the mode of preaching he had adopted. He distinctly asserted the doctrine of justification by faith alone. Following St. Augustine, he says, "He who hath made thee without help of thine, shall he not also save thee without asking thine aid?" On the doctrine of purgatory also, his comments were not entirely orthodox. Already had the nuncio of Venice interdicted his preaching for some days; this caused his citation to Rome, and he had proceeded to Bologna, and even reached Florence on his way thither, when, fearing most probably the Inquisition just then established, he determined to escape. Not inaptly does the historian of his order¹ describe his melancholy pause on reaching the summit of Mount Bernard; when, looking once more back on his beautiful Italy, he recalls the honours he had received there; the countless multitudes by whom he had been eagerly received, and respectfully listened to, and who afterwards conducted him with reverential admiration to his abode: certainly no man loses so much as an orator in losing his country: yet he was leaving it, and that when far advanced in years. Up to this moment he had retained the seal of his order; this he now resigned to his companion, and then turned his steps towards Geneva. His opinions, however, were not yet well settled, and he afterwards fell into very extraordinary errors.

Peter Martyr Vermigli left Italy about the same time. "I tore myself," he exclaims, "from all those false pretensions, and saved my life from the danger impending." He was subsequently followed by many of the scholars whom he had taught in Lucca.²

More nearly did Celio Secondo Curione permit the danger to approach him. He waited until the bargello appeared to arrest him, then, being a large and powerful man, he cut his way through the sbirri with the knife he wore, threw himself on his horse, and rode off. He also reached Switzerland in safety.

¹ Boveria, Annali, i. p. 438.

² From a letter of Peter Martyr to the community he had left, wherein he expresses regret for having occasionally veiled the truth, in Schlosser, Lives of Beza and Peter Martyr, p. 400. Gerdesius and M'Crie have collected many detached notices in the works already quoted.

Disturbances had before taken place in Modena; they now re-appeared, many being denounced to the Inquisition. Filippo Valentini withdrew to Trent, and Castelvetri thought it advisable, at least for a time, to secure himself by a retreat into Germany.

For persecution and dismay were now proceeding throughout all Italy; the rancour of contending factions came in aid of the inquisitors. How often did a man who had long vainly waited for an opportunity of destroying his enemy, now compass his designs by an accusation of heresy! Now had the old bigoted monks again become possessed of weapons, wherewith to combat that band of cultivated men whose literary labours had led them towards religious speculations, and whose intelligent reasonings had made them an object of hatred to the monks, who were in their turn despised and disliked by the literati. "Scarcely is it possible," exclaims Antonio dei Pagliarici, "to be a Christian, and die quietly in one's bed."¹ The academy of Modena was not the only one whose members separated. The Neapolitan also, founded by the Seggi, and originally intended for the study of literature only, but which had proceeded to theological disputations, in accordance with the spirit of the age, broke up by command of the viceroy.² The whole body of men of letters was subjected to the most rigorous supervision. In the year 1543, Caraffa decreed that no book, whether new or old, and whatever its contents, should for the future be printed without permission from the Inquisitors. Booksellers were enjoined to send in a catalogue of their stock, and to sell nothing without their assent. The officers of customs also received orders to deliver no package, whether of printed books or MS. to its address, without first laying them before the Inquisition.¹ This gradually gave rise to an Index of prohibited books; the first examples were set in Louvain and Paris. In Italy, Giovanni della Casa, who was on terms of the closest intimacy with the house of Caraffa, caused the first catalogue to be printed at Venice; this included about seventy works. Lists more carefully arranged and longer, appeared at Florence in 1552, at Milan in 1554; and the first published in the form afterwards used, was put forth at Rome in 1559. Writings by cardinals were included in this last, together with the poems of della Casa himself.

¹ Aonii Palearii Opera, ed. Wetsten. 1696, p. 91. Il Cl. di Ravenna al Cl. Contarini, Epp. Poli, iii. 208, already alludes to this: "Sendo quella città (Ravenna) partialissima, nè vi rimanendo huomo alcuno non contaminato di questa macchia delle fattioni, si van volentieri dove l'occasione s' offerisce caricando l'un l'altro da inimici." [This city (Ravenna) being filled with factions, no man being free from the stain, they take all occasions that offer of loading each other with accusations.]

² Giannone: Storia di Napoli, xxxii, c. v.

Nor were printers and booksellers the only persons subjected to these stringent regulations; even on private persons it was enforced as a duty of conscience to denounce all forbidden books, and contribute their utmost towards the destruction of all that should come to their knowledge. These laws were carried into execution with incredible severity. Though many thousands of the work "On the Benefits of Christ's death" were disseminated, not one was suffered to escape; the book entirely disappeared, and is no longer to be found. Whole piles of confiscated copies were burnt in Rome.

The secular arm was called in aid of the clergy for all these rules and restrictions.² The purposes of the papal

¹ Bromato, vii. 9.

² Many laymen offered their assistance. "Fu rimediato," says the Compendium of the Inquisitors, "opportunamente dal S. Officio in Roma con porre in ogni città valenti e zelanti inquisitori, servendosi anche talhora de secolari zelanti e dotti per ajuto della fede, come, verbi gratia, del Godescalco in Como, del conte Albano in Bergamo, del Mutio in Milano. Questa risoluzione di serviarsi de' secolari fu presa, perche non soli moltissimi vescovi, vicarii, frati e preti, ma anco molti dell' istessa inquisitione erano heretici." [This evil was opportunely remedied by the holy office in Rome, who placed able and zealous inquisitors in every city, employing also zealous and learned laymen in aid of the faith; as, for example, Godescalco in Como, Count Albano in Bergamo, and Mutio in Milan. These secular persons were employed, because many bishops, vicars, monks, and priests, nay, members of the Inquisition itself, were also heretics.]

see were in this instance largely assisted by the extent of its own dominions, since they could here set the example they desired to see followed, and offer a model for the imitation of other lands. The governments of Milan and Naples could present but slight opposition, because they had themselves intended to establish the Spanish Inquisition in their own territories, with this difference only; that in Naples the confiscation of property was not permitted. In Tuscany the Inquisition was rendered accessible to the influence of the civil power by the agency of the legate whom the duke, Cosimo de' Medici, found means to get appointed to his court. Notwithstanding this, however, the fraternities founded by it gave great offence. In Siena and Pisa, the most oppressive severities were put in force against the universities. In the Venetian states the Inquisitor was, it is true, not wholly emancipated from civil control; in the capital, three Venetian nobles were appointed to sit in his tribunals from April, 1547; while, throughout the provinces, the rector of each town took part in the proceedings, seeking counsel occasionally from learned doctors, or, if persons of great eminence were accused, applying for his guidance to the Council of Ten. With all this, however, the ordinances of Rome were for the most part, and on all essential matters, fully carried into effect.

And in this manner were all the agitations of dissentient opinion subdued by main force, and annihilated throughout Italy. Almost the whole order of the Franciscans were compelled to recantation, and the disciples of Valdez had for the most part to retract their opinions. In Venice a certain degree of freedom was allowed to the foreigners, principally Germans, who resided there for purposes of trade or study; but the natives, on the contrary, were compelled to abjuration, and their meetings were broken up. Many took to flight, and these fugitives were to be found in every town of Germany and Switzerland. Those who would not abjure their faith and could not escape, were subjected to the penalty. In Venice, they were taken beyond the lagoons by two boats: arrived in the open sea, a plank was laid between these, on which the condemned was placed; at the same moment the rowers pulled in opposite directions; the plank fell : once more did the unhappy victim invoke the name of Christ, and then the waves closed over him, and he sank to rise no more. In Rome, the auto-da-fé was held formally at certain intervals before the church of Santa Maria alla Minerva. Many sought escape by flying from place to place with their wives and children ; we trace their wanderings for a time, then they disappear ; they had most probably fallen into the toils of their merciless hunters. Others remained quiet. The duchess of Ferrara, who, but for the Salic law, would have sat on the French throne, was not protected by her birth and high rank. Her husband was himself her accuser. "She sees no one," says Marot, "against whom she can complain ; the mountains rise between herself and her friends ; she mingles her wine with her tears."

7. FURTHER PROGRESS OF THE JESUIT INSTITUTION

Such was the position of things in the Catholic hierarchy ; all opponents set aside by force, the tenets of the Church firmly reinstated in the mind of the age, and the ecclesiastical power enforcing their observance with weapons against which no resistance could avail. Then it was that, in closest alliance with this all-mastering power, the Order of the Jesuits arose.

Not in Rome only, but throughout all Italy, the most extraordinary success attended its efforts ; designed, in the first instance, for the common people, it was not slow to gain acceptance from the higher classes also.

It was highly favoured in Parma by the Farnese ;¹ princesses submitted themselves to the spiritual exercises it enjoined. In Venice, the Gospel of St. John was expounded by Lainez, expressly for the nobles ; and, in 1542, he succeeded, with the assistance of one of the Lippomano family, in laying the foundation of the Jesuits' college in that city. So extraordinary a degree of influence was gained by Francesco Strada over the citizens of Montepulciano, that many of them were induced to accompany him through the streets, begging ; Strada knocking at the different doors, and his companions receiving the donations. They made themselves extremely popular in Faenza, although this city had previously been much under the influence of Bernardino Ochino. They formed schools there, succeeded in allaying enmities of a hundred years' standing, and in forming societies for the relief of the poor. I name these instances as examples only ; suffice it to say, that they appeared everywhere, gained numerous adherents, and firmly established their ascendancy.

¹ Orlandinus expresses himself in singular terms :—"Et civitas," says he, ii. p. 78, "et privati, quibus fuisse dicitur aliqua cum Romano pontifice necessitudo, supplices ad eum literas pro Fabro retinendo dederunt." As if all the world did not know that Paul III had a son. Moreover, the Inquisition was subsequently established in Parma, as a consequence of the opposition manifested towards the priests who favoured Jesuitism.

But as Ignatius Loyola was altogether a Spaniard, and entirely possessed by the ideas of his nation, as also he had thence received his most zealous disciples, it followed that his society, wholly Spanish in spirit, made greater progress in Spain than even in Italy. A very important conquest was gained at Barcelona, in the person of Francesco Borgia, duke of Gandia. Such multitudes flocked to hear Araoz, in Valencia, that no church could contain them, and a pulpit was prepared for him in the open air. Equally successful was Francesco Villanova, in Alcala, where he gained numerous adherents of high consideration, notwithstanding his mean birth, weakness of health, and total want of all learning. From this city, and that of Salamanca, where, in 1548, the Jesuits commenced their establishment, in a small, wretched house, they afterwards extended themselves over all Spain.¹ Nor were they less cordially received in Portugal. Of the first two who, at his own request, were sent to him, the king retained one, Simon Roderic, near his person ; the other he despatched to the East Indies, and this was that Xavier who there gained for himself the name of an apostle and the glory of a saint. At both the Peninsular courts, the Jesuits obtained extraordinary popularity ; that of Portugal they reformed altogether, and in the Spanish court they were almost instantly selected as confessors by the most distinguished nobles, the president of the council of Castile, and the cardinal of Toledo.

¹ Ribadeneira : Vita Ignatii, c. xv. n. 244 ; c. xxxviii. n. 285.

So early as the year 1540, certain young men had been sent by Loyola to study in Paris; from that city the society extended itself over the Netherlands. In Louvain the most decisive success attended the efforts of Faber. Eighteen young men, already masters of arts or bachelors in that university, attached themselves to his steps, offering to abandon home and country, for the purpose of following him to Portugal. Already were the Jesuits seen in Germany; among the first who joined them was Peter Canisius, who entered their order on his twenty-third birthday, and was afterwards so effectual a promoter of their interests.

This rapid success was, of necessity, most powerfully influential in the development of the institution; the form assumed by it was as follows:—

Into the circle of his first companions, the class of the professed, Ignatius received but few; he found that men at once highly educated, good, and pious, were very rare; even in the first sketch of his purposes laid before the pope, he declares the intention of training young men according to his own views, and in colleges, which he hopes to found in different universities. Of these, a number surpassing his expectations presented themselves, as we have said; they constituted the class of scholastics, as distinguished from that of the members “professed.”¹

But in this arrangement a certain inconvenience was discovered. The professed, by their fourth and special vow, had bound themselves to perpetual travels in the service of the pope; but it would be utterly inconsistent to assign to these men the government of the many colleges now required, since such institutions would demand their continual residence. Ignatius thus found it necessary to constitute a third class, standing between the two just described.

¹ Pauli III facultas coadjutores admittendi, d. 5 Junii, 1546. “Ita ut ad vota servanda pro eo tempore quo tu, fili praeposite, et qui pio tempore fuerint ejusdem societatis praepositi, eis in ministerio spirituali vel temporali utendum judicaveritis, et non ultra astringantur.”—Corpus Institutorum, i. p. 15.

These were called spiritual coadjutors; they were priests, possessing the classic learning and general science required for the instruction of youth, and devoting themselves expressly to that employment. No portion of the Jesuit institution was more important than this, and, so far as my researches have enabled me to discover, its character was peculiar to that body, which is indebted to it for a large part of its unexampled influence and success. These coadjutors were allowed to settle themselves in such places as they chose to select; they assumed the control of education, and silently established a wide-spreading ascendancy for the order. They also took three vows only, and these, be it remarked, were simple, and not solemn; that is to say, the society could absolve them from these vows, in certain cases carefully defined, while any attempt on their part to leave the order was followed by immediate excommunication.

But one thing more was now requisite. The studies and occupations to which these classes were destined must have suffered undue interruption, had they been also subjected to the care of providing for their own subsistence. This, then, they were spared. The professed lived on alms in their houses, and the colleges were permitted to possess revenues in common. For the administration of this income, so far as it did not devolve on the professed, who were excluded from all share in the enjoyment of it, Ignatius appointed secular coadjutors, to whom the management of other affairs, merely external, was also intrusted. These secular coadjutors were equally bound by the three simple vows, but had to content themselves with the persuasion, that they were serving God, by aiding a society devoted to the salvation of souls; they were not suffered to seek for any other reward.

These arrangements were perfectly well calculated in themselves, and, at the same time, laid the foundation of a hierarchy, eminently fitted, by its several gradations, to subjugate the minds of those on whom it acted.¹

And now, if we examine the laws of which the code of the Jesuits came gradually to be formed, we shall perceive that an entire separation of its members from all the usual interests and relations of life was one of their principal objects. Love of kindred they denounced, as a carnal inclination.¹ The man who resigned his property to enter the order, was in no case to bestow it on his relations, but must distribute all to the poor.² He who had once become a Jesuit could neither receive nor write a letter that was not read by his superior. The society demands the whole being; all the faculties and inclinations of the man must be held in its fetters.

¹ The basis of the society was formed of "novices, guests, and indifferents;" from these arose the different classes.

It claims to share in the most intimate of his secrets; all his faults, nay, even all his virtues, must be carefully enumerated: a confessor is appointed him by his superiors, the general reserving to himself the right of granting absolution in such cases as it may be deemed expedient that he should take cognizance of.³ He insisted on this regulation as a means to his obtaining a perfect knowledge of his subordinates, that so he might the better use them at his pleasure.

For in the order of Jesuits, obedience takes the place of every motive or affection that usually awakens men to activity—obedience, absolute and unconditional, without one thought or question as to its object or consequences.⁴ No man shall aspire to any rank above that he holds. The secular coadjutor may not even learn to read or write without permission, if it happen that he do not possess these attainments. With the most unlimited abjuration of all right of judgment, in total and blind subjection to the will

¹ Summarium Constitutionum, § 8, in the Corpus Institutorum Societatis Jesu; Antwerp, 1709, tom. i. In Orlandinus, iii. 66, Faber is lauded for having once passed through his native town, after many years of absence, and proceeding on his journey without permitting himself even to halt.

² Examen generale, c. iv. § 2.

³ Rules found separately in the Summarium Constitutionum, §§ 32, 41; the Examen generale, §§ 35, 36; and Constitutionum Pauli III., c. i. n. 11. "Illi oasus reservabuntur," it is remarked in the latter place, "quos ab eo (superiore) cognosci necessarium videbitur aut valde conveniens."

⁴ The letter of Ignatius "to the Brethren of the Society of Jesus in Portugal." 8 Kal. Apr. 1553, § 3.

of his superiors, he must resign himself to be led, like a thing without life, as the staff, for example, that the superior holds in his hand, to be turned to any purpose seeming good to him. The society is to him the representative of the divine providence.¹

What a power was that now committed to the general—vested in him for life was the faculty of exacting this unquestioning obedience of thousands; nor is there one to whom he is responsible for the use made of it. By the plan of the order submitted to the pontiff in 1543, every member of the society, who might chance to be at the same place with the general, was to be called to the discussion of even the most trifling affairs: but by Julius III he was freed from this restriction in 1550, and is to take counsel only when he shall himself desire it. It was necessary to hold a council only for some material change in the constitution, or for the suppression of houses and colleges alone;² in every other case, all power is committed to him of acting as may be most conducive to the good of the society. He has assistants in the different provinces, but these confine themselves strictly to such matters as he shall confide to them. All presidents of provinces, colleges, and houses, he names at his pleasure: he receives or dismisses, dispenses or furnishes, and may be said to exercise a sort of papal authority on a small scale.¹

¹ Constitutiones, vi. 1. "Et sibi quisque persuadeat, quod qui sub obedientia vivunt, se ferri ac regi a divina providentia per superiores suos sinere debent, perinde ac cadaver essent." Here is also the other Constitution, vi. 5, according to which it would seem that even a sin might be enjoined: "Visum est nobis in Domino, . . . nullas constitutiones, declarationes vel ordinem ullum vivendi posse obligationem ad peccatum mortale vel veniale inducere, nisi superior ea in nomine Domini Jesu Christi vel in virtute obedientiae jubeat." One can scarcely believe one's eyes as one reads this. For the most natural construction of the words is to refer "ea" to "peccatum mortale vel veniale," so that the superior could really permit a sin. But this is not the true meaning. The Constitution is connected with the Declaration of the Dominican rules, in which the Priors were empowered "praecepta facere quae transgressores obligabunt non solum ad poenam, sed etiam ad mortalem culpam." Here it is a question of orders, the infringement of which involves spiritual guilt. In the same way the general of the Jesuits is to have power to impose duties, the dereliction of which renders the offender guilty of sin, of one kind or another. This is an authority of a very extraordinary character. In the case of the Dominicans it was rather an increase in the severity of the rule of the order: with the Jesuits it was part of the unconditional obedience, which the general was empowered to enforce.

² "Adjutus, quatenus ipse opportunum judicabit, fratrum suorum consilio, per se ipsum ordinandi et jubendi quae ad Dei gloriam pertinere videbuntur, jus totum habeat," says Julius III Confirmatio Instituti.

In all this there was one only danger to be feared, namely, that the general, possessing so great a power, might himself depart from the principles of the society: certain restrictions were therefore imposed on his habits of life. To us it will certainly not seem so important as it may have appeared to Ignatius, that the Society or its deputies were intrusted with the arrangement of certain external observances, the hours of meals and sleep, for example, the dress, and whatever concerned the daily habits.² It is, nevertheless, still something, that the supreme power should be deprived of a freedom of action enjoyed by the most insignificant individual. The assistants who were not named by himself, maintained a constant supervision over him in these respects; and one officer, called the admonitor, was specially appointed to warn him of any lapse. In the event of any gross fault, the assistants could summon the general congregation, who had the power of pronouncing a sentence of deposition against the offending general.

This carries us a step further in our examination of the order.

We must not suffer ourselves to be dazzled by the hyperbolic descriptions left us of their power by the Jesuits themselves; rather let us consider what may have been practicable, considering the great extension soon attained by the society. We shall then arrive at the following results: To the general remained the supreme guidance of the whole order, more particularly the control of the superiors, whose consciences he was to scrutinize and direct—whose duties he alone could assign. These superiors, on the other hand, possessed a similar power within their own jurisdiction, and frequently exercised it with a severity exceeding that of the general himself.¹ The superiors and general were to a certain extent counterpoised by each other. The general was also to be informed as to the personal characteristics of every subordinate, and although it is obvious that he could interfere on important occasions only, yet the supervision remained in his hands. A select number of the professed, on the other hand, were authorised to exercise supervision over him.

¹ Constitutiones, ix. 3.

² Schedula Ignatii, AA. SS. Commentatio praevia, n. 872.

Other institutions have existed, forming a world within the world, and which, releasing their members from all exterior obligations, have sought to absorb their whole being to themselves, and to inspire each individual with a new principle of life and action. This was pre-eminently the purpose of the Jesuits, and it was fully accomplished. But there was a further peculiarity in their proceedings; while the order was itself taking captive the mind, and holding it as a mere piece of property, it nevertheless demanded the full development of all the faculties in each individual. No Jesuit was in any sense his own property; he belonged fully and unreservedly to the order: thus all personal consideration was merged in a life of mutual supervision and subordination. But a firmly compacted and perfect unity was thus formed,—a body endowed with nerve and vigorous power of action. It was to secure this last effect that the monarchical power was so earnestly enforced, to this did they subject themselves unreservedly; nor did they ever abandon it, unless the possessor himself departed from its vital principles.

There was perfect consistency in the refusal of the Jesuits to permit their members the acceptance of ecclesiastical dignities; for these might have involved the fulfilment of duties, or the forming of relations, over which the society could no longer exercise control. In the earlier days of Jesuitism this rule was most strictly observed: when the bishopric of Trieste was proposed to Jay, he neither would nor dared to accept it; and on the retraction of the proposal, in consequence of a letter from Ignatius, by Ferdinand I who had offered it, the general caused solemn masses to be said in thanksgiving and a Te Deum to be sung.¹

¹ Mariana, Discurso de las enfermedades de la Compania de Jesus, c. xi.

A second effectual distinction is, that the order of Jesuits emancipated itself from the more ascetic and cumbrous forms of monastic devotion. The members severally were also enjoined to avoid excess in their religious exercises: they were not to weaken themselves by fasting, vigils, or castigations, or to abstract more time than was strictly needful from the service of mankind. In labour, also, moderation was commanded; "the spirited steed must have the curb rather than the spur, and no man should load himself so heavily with his weapons that he cannot wield them to advantage." On no account was any member of the society to labour until the elasticity of his mind became endangered by his toils.²

Thus the society, regarding its members as its own exclusive property, was desirous of seeing them attain to the highest culture of their energies, physical and mental,—but ever in accordance with its first great principle of obedience.

This careful development of the individual was, in fact, indispensable to the performance of the duties assigned him—those of the pulpit, that is, of the school and the confessional: to the two latter in particular the Jesuits devoted themselves with a zeal more peculiarly their own.

The instruction of youth had been hitherto left to those men, who, after long study of profane literature, had turned their attention to theological subjects, which they treated in a manner never very acceptable to the court of Rome, and eventually altogether reprobated by it. The Jesuits took upon themselves to expel these men from their office, and to occupy it in their stead. They began by the closest observance of a carefully considered system, dividing the schools into classes, and pursuing in these a method strictly uniform, from the earliest principles of learning to the highest degree of science. They paid great attention to the moral culture, and formed their pupils to good character and correct manners ; they were favoured by the civil power, and, finally, their instructions were given gratis. Whenever a prince or city had founded one of their colleges, no private person needed further to incur expense for the education of his children. They were expressly forbidden to ask or accept remuneration or reward ; as were their sermons and masses, so was their instruction altogether gratuitous. There was not even the usual box for offerings in their churches. As men are constituted, this of itself must have aided to make the Jesuits popular, the rather as they taught with great ability and equal zeal. "Not only were the poor assisted by this practice," says Orlandinus, "it was a solace to the rich also."¹ He remarks further on the extraordinary success of their efforts. "Many are now shining in the purple of the hierarchy," he declares, "whom we had but lately on the benches of our schools ; others are engaged in the government of states and cities. We have trained up bishops and their counsellors, nay, other spiritual communities have been filled from our schools." The most remarkable talents among these pupils were appropriated by the order whenever that was possible, as may well be supposed, and the society had in fact formed itself into a body of instructors for all ages, that, extending over every Catholic country, acquired an amount of influence altogether incalculable. From the Jesuits education received that tone of religion by which it has since been marked, and was impressed by a strict unity of character, whether as regards method, doctrine, or discipline.

¹ Extract from the Liber memorialis of Ludovicus Gonsalvus: "Quod desistente rege S. Ignatius indixerit missas et 'Te Deum laudamus,' in gratiarum actionem."—Commentarius praevious, in AA. SS. Julii 7. n. 412.

² Constitutiones, v. 3. 1. Epistola Ignatii ad Fratres qui sunt in Hispania. Corpus Institutorum, ii. 540.

But how predominant was the ascendancy assured to them by the address with which they gained possession of the confessional, and the direction of consciences ! No age of the world has been more accessible than was the period of their commencement to such influence as they exercised ; but perhaps none has more needed it. Their code of laws enjoins the Jesuits "to pursue one uniform method in their manner of giving absolution, to exercise themselves in cases of conscience, to adopt a short and rapid mode of interrogating their penitents, and to hold the examples of the saints, their words and other helps, ever ready against every sort of sin;"¹ rules which are obviously well calculated to meet the wants of mankind. But the extraordinary success obtained by the society, and which involved a real diffusion of their peculiar modes of thinking, was further promoted by another essential adjunct.

¹ Orlandinus, lib. vi. 70. A comparison might be made with the conventual schools of the Protestants, in which the religious tendency was also fully predominant. See Sturm, in Ruhkopf, Geschichte des Schulwesens, p. 378. The points of difference must of course be also considered.

This was the very remarkable little manual of spiritual exercises which Ignatius, I will not say originated, but which he certainly worked out in a most peculiar manner.² By this his first disciples were attracted, and it was equally efficacious with later ones; among his followers generally it ever maintained the highest authority, and served more than all else to make them his own; its utility was progressive and powerful, the more so perhaps because it was recommended for occasional study only; and as a resource in moments of inward distress and spiritual craving.

It is not a book of doctrine, but rather a guide to self-contemplation, "the longings of the soul," says Ignatius, "are not to be appeased by a cloud of acquirements; by intuitive perception of things sacred alone can it be satisfied."³

It is the guidance of this perception that he proposes to himself; the spiritual adviser intimates the subjects to be reflected on; the neophyte has only to follow them out. His thoughts are to be fixed on them before retiring to rest, and immediately on awaking; he must abstract himself with determination from all other objects of thought; windows and doors must be closed; kneeling or prostrate on the earth, he must continue his task of self-examination.

He begins by a deep consciousness of sin; he reflects

¹ Regula Sacerdotum, §§ 8, 10, 11.

² For after all that has been written on either side, it is manifest that Ignatius had a similar work, by Garcia de Cisneros, in view; the most peculiar part of it seems, nevertheless, to have been entirely his own. Comm. prae., n. 64.

³ "Non enim abundantia scientiae, sed sensus et gustus rerum interior desiderium animae replere solet."

that for one single crime the angels were cast into hell, while for him, who has committed so many, the saints are ever interceding. The heavens with their stars, animals and all plants of the earth, minister to his good. That he may now be freed from his guilt, and may not be condemned to eternal damnation, he calls on the crucified Redeemer; he receives his replies; there is between them a dialogue as of a friend with his friend, a servant with his master.

He next seeks edification from profound reflections on the events of sacred history: "I see," he exclaims, "how the three persons of the Godhead look down upon the whole earth, which they behold filled with men condemned to hell; they resolve that the second person shall, for their redemption, assume the nature of man. I survey the whole wide circuit of the globe, and in one corner I discern the hut of the Virgin Mary, whence proceeds salvation." He proceeds from step to step through the sacred histories, he represents to himself the different events in all the fulness of their details, and according to the categories of their import; the religious fancy, freed from the trammels of the letter, is allowed the utmost scope for expansion, the disciple imagines himself to touch the garments, to kiss the footsteps of the sacred personages; in this excitement of the imagination, in the full conviction how great is the blessedness of a soul replete with divine grace and virtues, he returns to the consideration of his own condition; if his position in life be still undecided, he must choose it now, in accordance with the wants and wishes of his heart, whilst he has one only aim in view, that of becoming consecrated to the glory of God, in whose presence, and in that of all the saints, he believes himself to stand. If his choice be already made, he then reviews his manner of life, his daily walk and conversation, the ordering of his household, his needful expenditure, what he has to give to the poor; on all of which he reflects in the frame of mind that he will desire to have always maintained, when arrived at the hour of his death; having no other object before him than such as may tend to the glory of God and his own salvation.

Thirty days are devoted to these exercises; reflections on sacred history, on his own personal circumstances, prayers and resolutions occupy the hours, and alternate with each other. The soul is kept in ceaseless excitement and activity, occupied with itself; finally, when the individual represents to himself the provident care of God, "who in all his creatures effectually works for the good of man," he once more believes himself to be standing before the Lord and his saints, he beseeches the Almighty to permit the dedication of his service and adoration to himself. He offers up his whole being, freedom, memory, understanding, will; thus does he conclude with him the covenant of love. "Love consists in the community of all faculties and possessions." In return for this its devotion, God imparts his grace to the soul.

It will suffice for our purpose to have given a rapid glance at this extraordinary book. In its general tenour, its various propositions, and their manner of connection, there is a certain persuasiveness that does certainly excite the spirit, but restrains it at the same time within most narrow limits. Admirably calculated for its peculiar aim, that of contemplation guided by the fancy, it is all the more successful from being the result of Loyola's own experiences. He has here recorded all the most remarkable phenomena of his religious awakening and spiritual progress, from their first commencement to the year 1540, when he received the sanction of the pope. It has been said that the Jesuits profited by the experience of the Protestants, and in some few particulars this may have happened; but on the whole, they present a very strong contrast to each other. In this work at least, Ignatius has opposed to the discursive, logical, and searching method of the Protestants (a method by its very nature polemical), one of his own which is entirely different, being short, intuitive, calculated for awakening the imaginative faculties and prompting to instant resolve.

And in this manner did those visionary elements that had characterized his commencement, condense themselves at length to an extraordinary force of practical influence. Never wholly freed from the military habits of his early days, Loyola formed his society into a sort of religious standing army; selected carefully man by man, enrolled under the influence of the religious fantasy, each one trained for the especial service he was intended to perform, and commanded by himself: such were the cohorts that he dedicated to the service of the pope. He lived to see their ascendancy over the greater portion of the earth's surface.

At the period of his death, the company of Ignatius numbered thirteen provinces, exclusive of the Roman.¹ A mere glance will serve to shew where the strength of the order lay; the majority of these provinces, seven namely, belonged to the western peninsula and its colonies. In Castile there were ten colleges. Aragon and Andalusia had each five. Portugal had gone beyond even this: houses were established there both for professed members and novices. Over the colonies of Portugal the Company of Jesus exercised almost absolute mastery. Twenty-eight members of the order were occupied in Brazil, while in East India, from Goa to Japan, not less than a hundred were employed. An attempt on Ethiopia was also made from this quarter, and a Provincial was sent thither, the success of the enterprise not being doubted. All these provinces of Spanish and Portuguese languages and manners, were directed by one commissary-general, Francesco Borgia. The nation that had given birth to the founder, was also that where his influence was most immediately and firmly established. But the effect produced in Italy was very little inferior. There were three provinces of the Italian tongue: first, the Roman, under the immediate direction of the general; this comprised Naples; it was furnished with houses for novices and professed; two colleges within the city, the "Collegium Romanum" and "Collegium Germanicum": the last erected for Germans only, by the advice of Cardinal Morone, but not with any great success. Second, the Sicilian, containing four colleges completed and two begun. The first Jesuits had been introduced into Sicily by the viceroy della Vega;² Messina and Palermo had vied with each other in establishing colleges, and from these it was that the others afterwards arose. The third Italian province comprehended all the north of Italy, and contained ten colleges. The Order was not equally successful in other countries, where it was either opposed by

¹ In the year 1556. Sacchinus, Historia Societatis Jesu, p. ii., or Lainius, from the beginning.

² Ribadeneira: Vita Ignatii, n. 293.

Protestantism, or by a strong tendency to Protestant opinion. In France they had but one college actually in operation; and though two provinces were counted in Germany, both were as yet in their infancy. The first was to comprise Vienna, Prague, and Ingolstadt, but its condition was extremely precarious; the second was intended to include the Netherlands, but Philip II had not yet assured a legal existence to the Jesuits in that part of his dominions.

This great and rapid success was a guarantee of the power to which the society was destined to attain. The position it had secured in those purely Catholic countries, the two peninsulas, was a circumstance of the utmost importance.

CONCLUSION

Thus we perceive, that while the tenets of Protestantism were enlarging their influence over the minds of men on the one hand, a new impulse had on the other been received by Catholicism, and was acting vigorously in Rome and the court of its pontiff more especially. This last, equally with its opponent, had taken rise from the spirit of worldliness pervading the Church; or rather from the necessity of a change that this corrupt spirit had forced on the general perception.

These impulses had at first displayed a tendency towards approximation. There was a certain period during which Germany had not entirely resolved on casting off the hierarchy; there was also a moment when Italy seemed approaching towards a national modification of that hierarchy. That moment passed away.

The Protestants, guided by Scripture, retraced their steps with ever-increasing firmness towards the primitive forms of Christian faith and life. The Catholics, on the contrary, held fast by the ecclesiastical institutions, as these had been consolidated in the course of centuries, and determined only on renovating all, and infusing increased energy, a more rigid severity, and deeper earnestness of purpose into each. On the one hand there rose up Calvinism, far more anti-

Catholic than Lutheranism; on the other, whatever could but recall the idea of the Protestant doctrines was confronted by unflinching opposition, and repelled with determined hostility.

Thus rise two neighbouring and kindred springs on the summit of the mountain, but each seeks its path to the valleys in an opposite direction, and their waters are separated for ever.

BOOK III

THE POPES ABOUT THE MIDDLE OF THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY

THE POPES ABOUT THE MIDDLE OF THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY

THE sixteenth century is distinguished from all others by the number of religious systems produced in its course. Even to the present day these are affecting us; the various opinions taking their birth at that period have formed the medium in which we still "live, move, and have our being."

If we seek to ascertain the precise moment when the separation between Catholics and Protestants was completed, we shall find that it was not strictly coincident with the first appearance of the reformers, for opinions did not immediately assume a fixed character, and, for a certain time, there was rational ground of hope that a compromise between the conflicting doctrines might be effected. It was not until the year 1552 that all prospect of this kind was utterly destroyed, and that the three great forms of Christianity in the West were separated for ever.

Now indeed did the wide divergence of all become apparent. Lutheranism assumed a severity, an exclusiveness, an asceticism hitherto unknown to its habits. The Calvinists departed from it in the most essential doctrines, though Calvin himself had in earlier times been considered a Lutheran; while, in hostile contrast to both, Catholicism invested herself with those forms that still distinguish her practice. Each of these theological systems sought eagerly to establish itself in the position it had assumed, each laboured to displace its rivals and to subjugate the world.

On the first glance it might seem that Catholicism, seeking only to renew existing institutions, would have found less difficulty than its opponents in pressing forward and securing the ascendancy; but the advantage it possessed was in a manner rendered nugatory by many opposing influences.

No less than its rivals had Catholicism to contend with the various impulses then affecting the world: eagerness for temporal advancement, profane learning, and heterodox opinions in religion. It was not unlike a principle of fermentation, of which it might still be questioned whether it would seize and assimilate the elements surrounding it, or itself be overmastered by them.

The first important obstacle was presented by the popes themselves, their personal character and the policy they pursued.

It will have become obvious to the reader, that a temper of mind in direct contrast with their spiritual character had taken firm hold on the heads of the Church, and had elicited that opposition from which Protestantism had received so mighty an impetus.

The question now was, whether the zeal for ecclesiastical innovation just arisen in the Church would overcome and transform this temper, and to what extent.

To me it appears that the antagonism of these two principles, the conflict between the policy, whether active or passive, hitherto prevailing and now become inveterate, and the necessity for a complete internal reform, is that which constitutes the paramount interest in the history of the popes next following.

I. PAUL III

It is an error prevalent in our times, that we attach undue importance to the purposes and influence of governments, princes, and other eminent persons; their memory is frequently loaded with the sins of the multitude, as frequently they have credit for performing what in fact proceeded from the general effort of the community.

The Catholic movement, considered in the preceding book, took its rise under Paul III; but it would be a mistake to ascribe its origin to that pope. He perceived its importance to the Roman see, and not only permitted it to take its course, but in many ways promoted its success. Still we may declare without hesitation that his own feelings were at no time in sympathy with the earnest sincerity of its spirit.

Alexander Farnese—this was the name of Paul III—was quite as worldly in character as any of his predecessors. Born in the year 1468, his education was completed within the fifteenth century. He studied under Pomponio Leto at Rome, and in the gardens of Lorenzo de' Medici at Florence; thus imbued with the love of art and elegant literature proper to his period, he did not escape the contagion of its morals. His mother found it needful on a certain occasion to keep him a prisoner in the castle of Saint Angelo. The future pontiff seized a moment when the attention of his guard was attracted by the procession of the Corpus Christi, and, lowering himself from the walls by a rope, succeeded in making his escape. He acknowledged a son and a daughter, both illegitimate; but no great offence was taken at such affairs in that day, and they were not suffered to impede his fortunes; we thus find him a cardinal while still very young. His hereditary estates were situated at Bolsena, and he there constructed a villa so inviting to the elegant tastes of Pope Leo X that he honoured the cardinal by more than one visit to it. The Farnese palace also, one of the finest in Rome, was commenced during his cardinalate; but these occupations were by no means the principal interests of his life; he had much higher ambitions, and from the first had fixed his thoughts on the supreme dignity.

It is entirely characteristic of Farnese that he sought to attain this eminence by means of a complete neutrality. The French and Imperial factions then divided Italy, Rome, and the College of Cardinals. He conducted himself with so deliberate a caution, with so fortunate a circumspection, that no one could say to which of these parties he most inclined. He was on the point of being elected pope, even at the death of Leo, and again at that of Adrian, and he could not live in charity with the memory of Clement VII, whom he accused of occupying the papal chair for twelve years, during which it ought to have been his own. At length, in October, 1534, in the fortieth year of his cardinalate and the sixty-seventh of his life, he attained the end so long desired, and ascended the papal throne.¹

He was now to feel all the weight of those contentions so profoundly agitating the world, the strife of those two great parties between which he was himself to hold so important a place; the necessity for opposing the Protestants, at the same time that he was drawn into secret connection with them by their political position; the wish he could not but feel from the situation of his Italian principality to weaken the preponderance of Spain, and the great danger involved in every attempt to do so; the pressing need of reform, and the mortifying restrictions with which this seemed to threaten the papal power.

The mode in which his character developes itself in the turmoil of these contradictory demands is well worthy of notice.

The habits of Paul III were easy, magnificent, and liberal; rarely has a pope been so much beloved in Rome as he was. There was an elevation of mind in the way in which he elected distinguished men for the sacred college, even without their knowledge; how well does this contrast with the petty personal considerations by which such appointments had usually been determined! Nor was he content with merely appointing them, he granted to all an unwonted degree of liberty; he endured contradiction in the consistory, and encouraged unrestricted discussion:²

¹ Onuphrius Panvinus: Vita Pauli III.

² In the year 1538, Marco Antonio Contarini made a report to the Venetian senate on the court of the pontiff. Unfortunately, I have not found this work either in the archives of Venice or elsewhere. In a MS. concerning the Turkish war, with the title, "Tre Libri delli Commentari della Guerra, 1537-8-9," now in my possession, I find a short extract therefrom, whence I have derived the notices given in the text. "Disse del stato della corte, che molti anni inanzi li prelati non erano stati in quella riforma di vita ch' eran allora, e che li cardinali havevano libertà maggiore di dire l'opinione loro in consistorio ch'avesser avuto gia mai da gran tempo, e che di ciò il pontefice non solamente non si doleva, ma se n'era studiatisimo, onde per questa ragione si poteva sperare di giorno in giorno maggior riforma. Considerò che tra cardinali vi erano tali uomini celeberrimi che per opinione commune il mondo non n'avria altrettanti." [Of the state of the court, he affirmed,

But thus leaving due liberty to others, and according to every man the advantages incident to his position, he would allow no one of his prerogatives to fall into disuse or be neglected. Certain remonstrances being addressed to him by the emperor on his having advanced two of his grandsons to the cardinalate at too early an age, he replied that he would do as his predecessors had done, that examples might be cited of infants in the cradle becoming cardinals. The partiality he displayed for his family was beyond what had been customary even in the head of the Church,¹ and his resolution to raise his house to the princely dignity, as other popes had done, was early made manifest.

Not that he sacrificed every other consideration to this purpose, as did Alexander VI; this could not be alleged against him; he laboured earnestly, on the contrary, for the promotion of peace between France and Spain, and for the suppression of the Protestants; he strove anxiously to subjugate the Turks, and to advance the reformation of the Church; but also, and together with all these cares, he had it much at heart to exalt his own house.

Proposing to himself so many conflicting purposes, whether for the public service or his own private affairs, this pontiff was necessarily forced on a policy in the utmost degree circumspect, watchful, and temporising, so much always depending on the favourable moment, the happy combination of circumstances. These he was compelled that for a long time the prelates had not led such reformed lives; that the cardinals had more liberty to give their opinions, than for many years past; the pope was so far from complaining of this, that he did his best to promote it; from all which one might hope now to see greater reforms. He considered that among the cardinals were men of such high eminence, that by the common opinion the world had nothing to equal them.]

¹ Suriano, 1535: "E Romano di sangue et è d'animo molto gagliardo: . . . stima assai l'ingiurie che gli si fanno, et è inclinatissimo a far grandi i suoi." Varchi (Istorie Fiorentine, p. 636) declares of the pope's principal secretary, Messer Ambrogio, "that he could have whatever he desired, and desired to have whatever he could." Among other gifts, he once received sixty silver washing-basins, with their ewers. "How comes it," asked some one about the court, "that with so many washing-basins, Messer Ambrogio cannot keep clean hands?"

to prepare and mature by degrees most cautiously calculated, and when the decisive moment had arrived, it was to be seized with the utmost promptitude, and made to yield the largest possible amount of profit.

The various ambassadors found it difficult to treat with him. They were surprised to see, that though betraying no want of courage, he was ever reluctant to decide. His object was to entangle others, and to gain some promise that should fetter them, some assurance that could not be recalled; but never would he utter a word that could pledge himself. This disposition was obvious, even in minor affairs; he was disinclined either to refuse or to promise any thing, but seemed always anxious to keep his hands free up to the last moment. How much more, then, in circumstances of difficulty! It would occasionally happen, that he would himself suggest some means of escape from an evil, some expedient against a danger; but if any one sought to act on this, the pope at once drew back; he desired to remain always master of his own proceedings.¹

¹ In the Lettres et Mémoires d'Etat, par Guill. Ribier, Paris, 1666, are found numerous specimens of his negotiations and their character, from 1537 to 1540, and from 1547 to 1549 in the despatches of the French ambassadors. Matteo Dandolo describes them minutely in a MS. now in my possession: Relatione di Roma, 1551, d. 20 Junii, in Senatu. "Il negoziare con P. Paolo fu giudicato ad ogn'un difficile, perche era tardissimo nel parlare, perche non voleva mai proferire parola che non fusse elegante et exquisita, cosi nella volgare come nella Latina e Greca, che di tutte tre ne faceva professione (I should not think he would often use Greek in his negotiations) e mi aveva scoperto di quel poco che io ne intendeva. E perche era vecchissimo, parlava bassissimo et era longhissimo, nè volea negar cosa che se gli addimandasse; ma nè anche (volea) che l'uomo che negoziava seco potesse esser secuio di havere havuto da S. Sà. il sì piu che il no, perche lei voleva starsi sempre in l'avantaggio di poter negare e concedere: per il che sempre si risolveva tardissimamente, quando volea negare." [To negotiate with Pope Paul was ever thought difficult by all men, because he was very slow in speech, not wishing to utter a word that was not most select and elegant, whether in the vulgar tongue, or in Latin or Greek; for he professed them all three, and soon discovered in me what little I knew of them, and being very old, he spoke in low tones, and was very prolix: he would not refuse what was asked from him; but neither would he that the man who negotiated with him should be sure that he had had the "yes," rather than the "no" from his holiness: he would always be on the vantage ground of being able

Paul III belonged, as we have said, to the classic school of which we have spoken before, and was studious of elegance in expression, as well in Latin as Italian. His words were selected and weighed, with reference to their form, as well as import; they were then delivered in low tones, and with the most cautious deliberation.

It was not easy for a man to be sure of the terms on which he stood with Pope Paul. Many people thought it safer to infer the very opposite from what his words would imply; but this was not, perhaps, always advisable. Those who observed him most nearly, remarked, that when his hopes of any project were at the highest, he usually abstained from all mention of the subject, or of any person or thing that could lead to it.¹ Thus much was manifest to all, that he never abandoned a purpose, when once he had fixed his mind on it; he trusted to carry all his undertakings to a prosperous issue, if not immediately, yet at some future time, by some change of measures, or under altered circumstances.

It was perfectly consistent with the habits of a mind so constituted, with forethought so closely calculating, with a disposition so warily to guard all points, and secretly to ponder on all purposes, that Paul should take heavenly as well as earthly influences into his reckoning. The influence of the stars on human actions was rarely questioned in those times, and this pontiff held no important sitting of his consistory, undertook no journey, without selecting that day when the aspect of the constellations was most favourable.² An alliance with France was impeded by the weighty fact, that no conformity could be discovered between the nativity of her monarch and that of the pope. Paul would seem to have felt himself to be surrounded by mutually to grant or to refuse, wherefore he was always most slow to resolve when he chose to deny.]

¹ Remarks of the Cardinals Carpi and Margareta: "che son los," says Mendoza, "que mas platica tienen de su condicion." [Who are the persons most familiar with his disposition.]

² Mendoza: "Es venido la cosa a que ay muy pocos cardenales, que concierten negocios, aunque sea para comprar una carga de leña, sino es o por medio de algun astrologo o hechizero." As regards the pope also, we find the most unquestionable particulars related.

opposing agencies, not only of this world below, but also of that above, whose part in his affairs he sought to ascertain from the configurations of the stars. His hope was to propitiate both, to mitigate their evil influences, to derive profit from their favourable conjunctures, and dexterously to steer his bark to port between the rocks that menaced from every side.

Let us see by what means he sought this end; whether he found them adequate to his purposes, or not; whether he did indeed raise himself above the conflicting forces of the world, or whether he was swallowed up in the vortex.

In the early part of his pontificate he did, in effect, succeed in forming an alliance with Charles V and the Venetians, against the Turks. With great earnestness he exhorted the Venetians to this enterprise, and hopes were again felt that the boundaries of Christendom might be extended to Constantinople.

There was, nevertheless, a formidable obstacle to this undertaking in the war that had again been declared between Charles V and Francis I. The pope made every possible effort to bring about a reconciliation; the conference held between these two sovereigns at Nice was entirely of his arrangement, he himself proceeding to join it; and the Venetian ambassador, who was present, can find no words sufficiently strong for the eulogy of his zeal, and of the patience he displayed on that occasion. It was not, however, without the utmost assiduity on his part that a truce was arranged; the last moment was approaching,—for he had threatened to depart,¹—when at length the princes came to an understanding, which seemed afterwards to grow into a sort of intimacy.

Thus actively employed for the public welfare, the pope did not forget his own concerns; men observed, that, if possible, he always combined the two interests, and made the one advance the other. Thus, from the Turkish war he took occasion to appropriate Camerino. It was on the point of being incorporated with Urbino; the last Varana, heiress of Camerino, having married Guidobaldo II, who had entered on the government of Urbino in the year 1538.¹ The pope, however, declared that Camerino could not descend in the female line. The Venetians were in justice bound to support the duke, whose ancestors had constantly lived under their protection, and served in their armies, and they made an urgent and spirited appeal in his behalf, but were deterred from doing more by the fear of war. They reflected, that if the pope should call the emperor to his aid, that monarch would have so much the less power to make head against the Turks; or if France came to his assistance, the peace of Italy would be endangered, and their own position become more isolated,² and less advantageous. These things all considered, they left the duke to his fate, and he was compelled to resign Camerino, which the pope conferred on his grandson, Ottavio.

¹ Relatione del C^{mo}. M. Niccolo Tiepolo del Convento di Nizza. Informatt. Politiche, vi. (Library of Berlin). There exists also an old impression, reprinted by Du Mont, under a somewhat different title, iv. 2.

Already the house of Farnese was advancing in splendour and power. The conference at Nice had been very advantageous to Paul. Even while it was yet in progress his son, Pier Luigi, obtained Novara, with its territories, from the emperor, who also gave his solemn promise to marry his natural daughter, Margaret, on the death of Alessandro de' Medici, to Ottavio Farnese. The pope may be fully believed, when he affirms that he did not on that account ally himself exclusively with the imperial party. On the contrary, he desired to form an equally close connection with Francis I. Nor did the French king seem averse to this proposal, but promised him the hand of a prince of the blood,—the duke of Vendôme,—for his grand-daughter Vittoria.³

In this relationship to the two most exalted houses of the world, Paul found extreme satisfaction; he was fully sensible of the honour he derived from it, and even alluded to it in the consistory. The position of peace-maker, too, that he now occupied between those great powers, was equally flattering to his ambition, as spiritual chief of the Church.

¹ Adriani Istorie, 58, II.

² The deliberations are to be found in the before-mentioned Commentary on the Turkish War, which thus acquires a peculiar interest.

³ Grignan, ambassadeur du roi de France à Rome, au Connétable. Ribier, i. p. 251: "Monseigneur, sadite Sainteté a un merveilleux désir du mariage de Vendosme: car il s'en est entièrement déclaré à moy, disant que pour estre sa nièce unique et tant aimée de luy, il ne désiroit après le bien de la Chrestienté autre chose plus que voir sadite nièce mariée en France, dont ledit seigneur (le roy) luy avoit tenu propos à Nice, et après vous, Monseigneur, luy en aviez parlé."

But the further progress of these affairs was not altogether so fortunate. No advantage whatever could be gained over the Ottomans; on the contrary, it was Venice which was compelled to accept a peace on very unfavourable terms. The promise given by Francis at Nice was afterwards recalled; and though Paul did not abandon the hope of eventually effecting a family alliance with the house of Valois, the negotiations were tediously protracted. It is true, that the good understanding brought about by the pope between the emperor and king, seemed, for some time, to become even more perfect, insomuch, indeed, that Paul had well nigh felt his jealousy awakened, and complained that they neglected him, who had been the cause of this concord.¹ But this state of things did not long endure; contests ensued, the war was recommenced, and the pope then raised his thoughts to new designs.

In earlier times he had openly asserted among his friends, and even declared to the emperor, that Milan belonged to the French, and ought of right to be restored to them.² Gradually, however, this opinion was abandoned; and we presently meet with a proposal from Cardinal Carpi (who was more in his confidence than any other member of the Sacred College) to Charles V, of which the purport was altogether of a different character, and pointed to opposite conclusions.³

"The emperor," he now declares, "should not think of

¹ Grignan, 7 March, 1539. Ribier, i. 406. Le Cardinal de Boulogne au Roi, 20 April, 1539. Ibid. 445. The pope said to him—"qu'il estoit fort estonné, veu la peine et travail qu'il avoit pris pour vous appointer, vous et l'empereur, que vous le laissiez ainsi arrière."

² M. A. Contarini confirmed this in his report.

³ Discorso del Rev^{mo}. C^{le}. di Carpi, del 1543 (perhaps rather a year earlier), a Carlo V. Cesare, del modo del dominare.—Bibl. Corsini. n. 443.

being either count, duke, or prince, he should be emperor only. He should not possess numerous provinces, but rather great vassals. His prosperity has decreased since he took possession of Milan,—not that we counsel him to restore it to Francis, whose thirst for territorial acquisitions this would only serve to stimulate, but neither is it advisable that he should retain it.¹ If the emperor has enemies, it is because he is suspected of a desire to appropriate foreign dominions. Let him remove this suspicion; let him place Milan in the rule of some duke of its own, and Francis will then find no more adherents. The emperor, on the contrary, will have all Germany and Italy on his part; he may carry his banners among the most remote nations, and will associate his name (this is the expression) with immortality."

But if Charles must neither keep the duchy nor resign it to the French, to whom then must he transfer it? Paul thought the dilemma might be well escaped by according it to his grandson and the son-in-law of the emperor, Ottavio Farnese. This he had already hinted in earlier missions. At a new conference held with Charles at Busseto in 1543, he proposed it in form. The pope's schemes were very far-seeing, if it is true that he thought of marrying his niece to the heir of Piedmont and Savoy, so that his nephews would have ruled on both sides of the Po and both sides of the Alps.² Negotiations on the subject of Milan proceeded to some extent, and the pontiff entertained the most lively hopes. The Marchese del Vasto, governor of Milan, whom Paul had gained to his wishes, being somewhat credulous and fond of display, appeared one day with well-prepared words, to conduct Margaret, as his future sovereign, to Milan. I find, however, that the negotiation was broken off in consequence of certain exorbitant demands on the part of the emperor.¹ It is nevertheless difficult to believe that any consideration, however tempting, could induce Charles to resign a principality so important and so well situated, to any foreign influence.

¹ "Se la M. V. dello stato di Milano le usasse cortesia, non tanto si spegnerebbe quanto si accenderebbe la sete sua; sì che è meglio di armarsi di quel ducato contra di lui.—V. M. ha da esser certa, che, non per affettione che altri abbia a questo re, ma per interesse particolare, e la Germania e l'Italia, sinche da tal sospetto non saranno liberate, sono per sostentare ad ogni lor potere la potentia di Francia."

² Dandolo: Relatione di Francia, 1545: "Si è dubitato, che S. S^{ta}. fosse per tener con Cesare in queste trattatione massime a beneficio de il duca di Savoglio, col quale gli voleva dar la nepote." In France strong expressions (gagliarde parole) were heard on the subject.

The house of Farnese was indeed becoming sufficiently formidable to the emperor, even without this addition to their power and importance. Of the Italian provinces over which Charles governed, or wherein he held the ascendancy, there was not one in which the existing government had not been founded, or at least maintained, by force. Throughout the land, from Milan to Naples, at Florence, at Genoa, at Siena, everywhere in short, were to be found numbers of disaffected persons, belonging to different vanquished parties; Rome and Venice were full of emigrants. The Farnesi were not prevented by their close connection with the emperor from allying themselves with these parties; subdued indeed, but still formidable from the importance of their chiefs, their wealth, and numbers. At the head of the victors stood the emperor; the vanquished sought refuge with the pope. These last were bound together by ties innumerable, they were always closely connected with France, either openly or secretly, and were incessantly occupied with new plans and undertakings; these sometimes related to Siena, sometimes to Genoa, at other times to Lucca. How eagerly did Paul seek to obtain footing in Florence ! But in the young Duke Cosimo he met the very man best fitted to oppose him. With a proud self-reliance does Cosimo express himself on this subject.¹ "The pope," says he, "who has succeeded in so many undertakings, has now no wish more eager than that of doing something in Florence as well ; he would fain estrange this city from the emperor, but this is a hope that he shall carry with him into his grave."

¹ Pallavicini directly denies these transactions. There is indeed room to doubt their having occurred, from what is said by Muratori (Annali d'Italia, x. 2, 51). His authority is that of historians who may have written from hearsay; but a letter from Girolamo Guicciardini to Cosimo de' Medici, Cremona, 26 June, 1543, in the Archivio Mediceo at Florence, is decisive. Granvelle has also spoken of it. "S. M^a. mostrava non esser aliena, quando per la parte del papa fussino adempiute le larghe offerte che eran state proferte dal duca di Castro sin a Genova." [His majesty was not ill-disposed, if, on his part, the pope fulfilled those large offers made by the duke of Castro at Genoa.] I do not know what these offers may have been, but, in any case, they were too large for the pope. According to Gosselini, secretary to Ferrante Gonzaga, the emperor feared, "che in volgendo egli le spalle (i Farnesi) non pensassero ad occuparlo." [That once his back was turned, the Farnesi would bethink themselves of seizing it.] (Vita di Don Fernando, p. iv.) Very circumstantial and amusing particulars on this head are to be found in an unprinted Neapolitan biography of Vasto in the Chigi library at Rome.

The emperor and pope still stood opposed to each other in a certain point of view, as heads of rival factions ; if Charles had married his daughter into the family of the pope, this was only to keep the latter in check, and, as he has said himself, to maintain the existing state of things in Italy. Paul, on his side, desired to avail himself of his alliance with the emperor, to abstract if possible some portion of the imperial power to himself ; he would fain have derived advantage from the protection of the emperor, and at the same time have exalted his house by aid of the emperor's opponents. There was still a Guelphic and a Ghibelline party, in fact if not in name ; the last as usual adhering to the emperor and the first to the pope.

Notwithstanding these elements of discord, we find amicable relations existing between the two leaders in the year 1545. Margaret having the hope of soon presenting a descendant of the Caesar to the family of Paul, the feelings of the Farnesi were again turned towards the emperor. Cardinal Alessandro Farnese repaired to meet Charles at Worms, and this was one of the most important embassies ever despatched by Paul III : the cardinal once more succeeded in appeasing the emperor's displeasure ; in regard to some of the charges brought against his brothers and himself he set up a sufficient justification ; for others, he begged forgiveness, and promised that all would conduct themselves in future as became obedient servants and sons of his majesty. To this Charles replied, that on their doing so, he would treat them as his own children. This being settled, they next proceeded to the discussion of more important matters. They talked of the war with the Protestants, and decided on the immediate convocation of the council. Should the emperor resolve to take up arms against the Protestants, the pope would engage to support him with all the power he could muster, bring all his treasures to aid, and even, "were it necessary, his very crown should be sold in the service."¹

¹ A Letter of Cosimo, of the year 1537, found in the Medicean Archives : "Al papa non è restato altra voglia in questo mondo se non disporre di questo stato e levarlo dalla divotione dell' imperatore," &c.

And in effect, the council was opened in that same year, a circumstance of which we first find a satisfactory explanation in the arrangements just described. In 1546, war also commenced; the pope and the emperor united their power to annul the league of Schmalkalden, which was equally hostile to the temporal claims of the one and to the spiritual authority of the other. Paul contributed on this occasion both troops and money.

It was the emperor's purpose to carry on warlike measures at the same time that he employed peaceful negotiations; while he punished and curbed the disobedience of the Protestants by war, he desired that the council should determine ecclesiastical disputes, and should above all establish such reforms as might render submission in some degree possible on the part of the Protestants.

The success of the warlike operations exceeded all anticipation; the position of the emperor seemed at first utterly desperate, but under the most perilous circumstances, he maintained his firmness; and the autumn of 1546 saw North Germany entirely at his mercy. Cities and princes now emulously proffered submission; the moment seemed to have come, when, the Protestant party in Germany being entirely subjugated, the whole north of Europe might again be made Catholic.

¹ Respecting this embassy we have authentic information from Granvelle himself: Dispaccio di Monsignor di Cortona al Duca di Fiorenza: Vornatia, 29 Maggio, 1545: (Granvelle) "mi concludo in somma ch'el cardinale era venuto per giustificarsi d'alcune calunnie, e supplica S. M. che quando non potesse interamente disculpare l'attioni passate di N^{ro}. Signore sue e di sua casa, ella si degnasse rimetterle e non ne tener conto.—Expose di più, in caso che S. M. si risolvesse di sbattere per via d'arme, perche per giustitia non si vedeva quasi modo alcuno, li Luterani, S. Beatitudine concorrerà con ogni somma di denari."

In this crisis what was the conduct of the pope?

He recalled his troops from the imperial army, and transferred the council, now on the point of completing its mission, and exercising its powers of pacification, from Trent, where, at the request of the Germans, it was established, to his own second capital, Bologna; alleging as the pretext for this step, that some contagious disease had broken out in the former city.

There is no doubt as to his motives for these proceedings. The ecclesiastical duties of the papacy were again in direct collision with its political interests. That the whole of Protestant Germany should be really subjugated by the emperor, and entirely obedient to his behests, seemed by no means desirable to the pope; his astute calculations had taught him to look for something wholly different—that Charles might gain certain successes, whence advantage would accrue to the Catholic church; this he had hoped and expected; but he also believed, as he admits himself,¹ that the emperor would fall into difficulties innumerable, and be surrounded by such perplexities as would leave him, Paul, at perfect liberty for the pursuance of his own projects. Fortune mocked at all these deeply pondered plans: he had now to fear, and France pointed out the fact to his notice, that the imperial predominance would be extended to Italy also, and make itself felt both in spiritual and temporal affairs.

Nor was this all; the council also occasioned him increasing anxiety: it had long oppressed him,² and he had more than once bethought him of means by which to dissolve it. The victories of Charles were constantly adding to the boldness of the imperialist bishops, who now proposed measures of unusual audacity. Under the title of "censuræ," the Spanish prelates brought forward certain articles tending in their collective form to a circumscription of the papal dignity. The Reformation, which Rome had so long dreaded, seemed now indeed to have become inevitable.

¹ Charles Cl. de Guise, au Roy, 31 Oct. 1547 (Ribier, ii. p. 75); written after an audience of the pope. Paul declares the motives that led him to take part in the German war: "Aussi à dire franchement qu'il estoit bien mieux de l'empescher (l'empereur) en un lieu, dont il pensoit qu' aisement il ne viendroit à bout."

² Du Mortier, au Roy, 26 Avril 1547: "Je vous assure, Sire, que pendant il estoit à Trente, c'estoit une charge qui le pressoit fort."

Strangely do the words sound that relate the following facts, yet are they perfectly true. At the moment when all North Germany was trembling at the prospect of restoration to the papal authority, at that moment the pope was, and felt himself, an ally of the Protestants ! His joy at the progress made by the elector John Frederick against Duke Maurice, was manifest ; he wished nothing more ardently, than that the former might be equally able to hold out against the emperor. Francis I was at this time using his utmost efforts to combine the whole world in a league against Charles ; and the pope exhorted him earnestly "to succour those who were still holding out against the emperor, and were not yet overborne."¹ Once more it seemed probable to him that Charles might fall upon still greater difficulties, and have his hands occupied for a long time. "He believes this," says the ambassador of France, "because he wishes it."

But his hopes were again disappointed, the emperor's good fortune baffled all his calculations : Charles was victorious at Mühlberg, and carried off the two Protestant leaders prisoners. He could now direct his attention more closely than ever to his Italian designs.

It will be readily understood that the emperor was deeply irritated by the proceedings of Paul,—he saw through their motives most clearly. "The purpose of his holiness," he writes to his ambassador, "has from the first been to entangle us in this enterprise, and then to leave us in our embarrassment."² That the pope should recall his troops was a matter of no great moment; irregularly paid, and therefore undisciplined and disorderly, they were good for very little,—but the transfer of the council was indeed of importance.

¹ Le même, au même : Ribier, i. 637.—"S. S. a entendu que le duc de Saxe se trouve fort, dont elle a tel contentement comme celui qui estime le commun ennemy estre par ces moyens retenu d'exécuter ses entreprises, et connoist-on bien qu'il seroit utile sous-main d'entretenir ceux qui luy résistent disant que vous ne sçauriez faire dépense plus utile."

² Copia de la Carta que S. M. scribio a Don Diego de Mendoça, a 11 de Hebrero, 1547, aõs : "Quanto mas yva el dicho (prospero suceso) adelante, mas nos confirmavamos en creher que fuese verdad lo que antes se havia savido de la intencion y inclinacion de S. S. y lo que

And here we cannot but remark how wonderfully the Protestants were aided on this occasion, as before, by those dissensions between the papacy and the empire, arising from the political position of the former. By this council the means were presented of compelling the Protestants to submission, but the council itself had divided (the imperialist prelates remaining at Trent): thus, no decrees of universally binding validity being any longer possible, it was manifest that no recusant could be forced to give in his adhesion. The emperor had to endure that the most essential part of his purpose should be rendered nugatory by the defection of his ally. Not only did he continue to insist on the recall of the council to Trent, but even gave it to be understood that he would repair to Rome, and hold the council there himself.

In this emergency Paul at once resolved on his path. "The emperor is mighty," he remarked; "but we also can effect something, and have still some friends." The long-talked-of connection with France was now formed, by the affiancing of Orazio Farnese to a natural daughter of Henry II. Great efforts were made to include the Venetians in a general league: the exiles of the different countries at once aroused themselves to action. Disturbances broke out in Naples precisely at this critical moment, and a Neapolitan delegate presented himself to implore the pontiff's protection for his vassals in that country, while more than one of the cardinals recommended his acceding to their prayer.

And now again the Italian factions stood face to face, and with hostility all the more declared and decided from the fact that their respective leaders were openly at variance. On the one side were the governors of Milan and Naples, the Medici in Florence, the house of Doria in Genoa: the se dizia (es) que su fin havia sido por embaraçar nos en lo que estavamos y dexarnos en ello con sus fines, desíños y platicas, pero que, aunque pasasse a S. S. y a otros, esperavamos con la ayuda de N. S., aunque sin la de S. S., guiar esta impresa a buen camino."

centre of this party may be found in Don Diego Mendoza, imperial ambassador to the Roman court. On the other side were the pope and the Farnesi, the exiles and the malcontents, with a newly organized Orsini party, the adherents of France. That portion of the council remaining in Trent took part with the imperialists, while the members who had withdrawn to Bologna held fast to the pontiff.

The hatred borne by each of these parties towards the other was suddenly manifested by a deed of violence.

The close intimacy at one time subsisting between the pope and emperor had emboldened Paul to invest his son Pier Luigi with the cities of Parma and Piacenza, to be held as a dukedom in fief of the holy see;—not that he could proceed to this step with the reckless boldness of an Alexander or a Leo; he offered compensation to the Church by the cession of Camerino and Nepi, seeking to prove that the “Camera Apostolica” would suffer no loss by that transaction. To this effect he calculated the cost of defending those frontier towns, the sums to be disbursed by Pier Luigi in this behalf, and the revenue to be derived by the Church from her newly annexed territory. It was, however, only while in private conference with each cardinal that he could bring any one of them to his opinion,—even then he totally failed with many: some remonstrated openly, others purposely abstained from attending the consistory called to arrange the affair, and Caraffa, in particular, was seen on that day to make a solemn visit to the Seven Churches.¹ The emperor, also, was dissatisfied with this project of exchange; or, if the dukedom was to be transferred, he would have preferred to see it in the hands of his son-in-law Ottavio,² to whom Camerino also belonged. He permitted the transfer to proceed, because the friendship of the pope was at that moment needful to him; but he never concurred in it heartily; he knew Pier Luigi too well; all the cords of those secret associations which constituted the opposing power so formidable to the emperor's ascendancy in Italy, were held by this son of the pope. There was no doubt of his being aware of Fiesco's conspiracy; it was he who was believed to have saved Pietro Strozzi, the powerful chief of the Florentine exiles, by facilitating his escape across the Po, after an unsuccessful attack on Milan, and when the life of Strozzi hung on the turn of the moment; he was even suspected of a long-meditated intention of seizing the Milanese for himself.¹

¹ Bromato: Vita di Paolo IV, ii. 222.

² The negotiations for this affair are to be found in the Letter of Mendoza, dated 29th November, 1547. The pope says, “he had granted the fief to Pier Luigi, because the cardinals preferred this; and ‘haviendo de vivir tampoco como mostrava su indisposicion’” [because he had himself but short time to live, as was clear from his failing health].

One day the pope, who still believed that he was in the guardianship of favouring stars, and hoped to conjure whatever storms were threatening, repaired to the audience with feelings more than commonly cheerful; he enumerated the prosperous events of his life, and compared himself with the emperor Tiberius.² On that same day, his son, the possessor of his acquisitions, and the heir of his good fortune, fell a victim to the violence of their common enemies. Pier Luigi was attacked by conspirators at Piacenza, and assassinated.

The duke, who ruled his people with all the despotism characteristic of those times, and who sought more particularly to keep the nobles in subjection, had rendered himself obnoxious to the Ghibellines of Piacenza by various acts of violence; it was by them that his assassination was perpetrated; but there can be no doubt that the general belief of the day was well founded, which accused Ferrante Gonzaga, governor of Milan, of participation in the deed.³ Gonzaga's biographer, at that time his confidential secretary, and who seeks to exculpate him from his charge, declares that the intention was not to kill Pier Luigi, but to take him prisoner.⁴ I

¹ Gosselini: Vita di Ferr. Gonzaga, p. 20. Segni: Storie Fiorentine, p. 292.

² Mendoça, al Emperador, 18 Sept. 1547: "Gastò la mayor parte del tempo (on that day) en contar sus felicidades y compararse a Tiberio imperador."

³ "Compertum habemus Ferdinandum esse autorem," declares the pope in the consistory. Extrait du Consistoire tenu par N. S. Père, in a despatch from Morvillier, Venice, 7 Sept. 1547: Ribier, ii. p. 61.

⁴ Gosselini, p. 45: "Nè l'imperatore nè D. Fernando, come di find in certain manuscripts intimations yet more significant of the emperor himself having been in the secret of this design. I am reluctant to believe this without further evidence ; but this much is certain : the imperial troops at once took possession of Piacenza, asserting the rights of the empire to that city as its fief. This was a kind of retaliation on the pope for his defection in the war of Schmalkalden.

There is no parallel for the state of affairs that now ensued.

An expression was reported as proceeding from Cardinal Alessandro Farnese, to the effect that he could free himself from his difficulties only by the death of certain imperial ministers, that he could not bring this about by force, and must have recourse to stratagem. Thus warned, the persons threatened were seeking to secure themselves from poison, when two or three Corsican bravoës were arrested in Milan ; and these men, whether with truth or falsely I do not determine, confessed that they were hired by the connections of Paul to assassinate Ferrante Gonzaga. Be this as it may, Gonzaga was exasperated anew ; he declared that he must secure his own life as best he might, that nothing remained to him but to rid himself of some two or three of his enemies, either by his own hand or that of another.¹ Mendoza believes that there was a purpose entertained in Rome of destroying all the Spaniards found there ; the populace were to be secretly incited to this, and when the deed was done, it was to be excused on the plea that their fury could not be controlled.

No means of reconciliation seemed to present themselves ; there had been a wish to employ the daughter of the emperor as mediatrix, but Margaret had never cordially attached herself to the Farnese family ; her husband, who was much younger than herself, she utterly contemned, and exposed his evil qualities to the ambassadors without reserve ; she declared herself ready, " rather to cut off her child's head, natura magnanimi, consentiriono mai alla morte del duca Pier Luigi Farnese, anzi fecero ogni opera di salvarlo, comandando in specialità ai congiurati che vivo il tenessero."

¹ Mendoza al Emperador : "Don Hernando procurara de asegurar su vida come mejor pudiere, hechando a parte dos o tres di estos o por su mano o por mano de otros."

than to ask anything of her father that might be displeasing to him."

The correspondence of Mendoza with his court lies before me; it would be difficult to find anything that might be fairly compared with these letters, for the deeply rooted hatred they display, felt alike on both sides, each seeking to conceal his feelings from the other, but neither succeeding; one perceives in each, a sense of superiority that has steeped itself in bitterness, a contempt that is yet on its guard, a mistrust such as men feel towards some notoriously inveterate malefactor.

If the pope sought aid or refuge in this state of things, there was no country whence he could hope to find either, save France alone.

We find him accordingly employed through long hours with Cardinals Guise and Farnese, and the French ambassador, discussing the relations of the papal see to France. "He had read in old books," he said, "and heard from others during his cardinalate, that the Holy See was always pre-eminent in might and prosperity while attached to France; but, on the contrary, it ever sustained losses when this alliance had ceased; he had made experience of that truth since his own accession to the papal throne, and he could not forgive his predecessors Leo and Clement; he could not forgive himself, for the favour that had been shown to the emperor; now, at all events, he was fully determined to unite himself for ever with France. He hoped yet to live till he saw the papal court devotedly attached to the French king, whom he would seek to make the greatest prince in the world. His own house should be connected with that of France by indissoluble ties."¹

His intention was to form a league with France, Switzerland, and Venice, at first defensive only, but of which he remarked himself that it was "the door to an offensive alliance."² The French calculated that their friends, once

¹ Guise, au Roy, 31 Oct. 1547: Ribier, ii. 75.

² Guise, au Roy, 11 Nov. 1547: Ribier, ii. 81: "Sire, il semble au pape, à ce qu'il m'a dit, qu'il doit commencer à vous faire déclaration de son amitié par vous présenter luy et toute sa maison: et pour ce qu'ils n'auroient puissance de vous faire service, ny vous aider à united, would secure to them as important a territory in Italy as that possessed by the emperor. The whole Orsini party was again ready to devote itself with life and property to the king of France. The Farnesi thought that in the Milanese they could at the least count on Cremona and Pavia; the Neapolitan exiles promised to bring 15,000 men into the field, and at once to deliver up Aversa and Naples. Into all these plans the pope entered with great eagerness, he was himself the first to inform the French ambassador of a design upon Genoa. To make himself master of Naples, he would not have shrunk from a league with Algiers or the Grand Turk himself. Edward VI had just ascended the throne of England, and in that country the helm of state was directed by a government decidedly Protestant; none the less did Paul advise Henry II to make peace with England, "that he might be at liberty," says the pope, "to accomplish other designs for the interests of Christendom."¹

But violent as was the pope's hostility to the emperor, close as was his connection with France, and important as were the plans he proposed to adopt, yet the treaty was never completed, nor could he bring himself to resolve on taking the final step.

The Venetians were utterly astounded. "The pope," say they, "is assailed in his dignity, injured in his nearest kindred, the best possessions of his house are torn from his grasp; it should be his part to seize on every alliance and on all terms; yet, after so many offences and insults, we still see him irresolute and wavering."

Great personal injuries for the most part rouse men to extreme resolves; there are nevertheless certain natures, which still deliberate, however deeply offended, not because they are less prone to avenge themselves than others, but because, though the desire for vengeance is strong, the consciousness that their opponent is the more powerful is yet stronger. The prudence that weighs all consequence overpowers their resentment. Great reverses do not stimulate such men; on the contrary, they render them spiritless, feeble, and vacillating.

offenser, si vous premièrement vous ne les aidez à défendre, il luy a semblé devoir commencer par la ligne défensive, laquelle il dit estre la vraye porte de l'offensive." The whole correspondence relates to this topic.

¹ François de Rohan, au Roy, 24 Feb. 1548: Ribier, ii. 117: "S. S. m'a commandé de vous faire entendre et conseiller de sa part, de regarder les moyens que vous pouvez tenir, pour vous mettre en paix pour quelque temps avec les Anglais, afin que n'estant en tant d'endroits empesché vous puissiez plus facilement exécuter vos desseins et enterprises pour le bien public de la Chrestienté."

The emperor was too powerful to feel any serious apprehension of the Farnesi; he went on his way without giving himself further trouble concerning them. He protested solemnly against the sittings of the council in Bologna, declaring beforehand that every act which might be passed there was null and void. In the year 1548, he published the "Interim" in Germany. Paul found it intolerable, as was natural, that the emperor should prescribe a rule of faith; but however earnestly he complained of this, or of church property being left in the hands of its present (Protestant) possessors, the emperor remained utterly immoveable, though Cardinal Farnese declared that in the "Interim" he could point out some seven or eight heresies.¹ In the affair of Piacenza, again, Charles would abate no hair's breadth of his pretensions. The pope demanded immediate restitution of that city; the emperor maintained his claim to it in right of the Empire. Paul appealed to the treaty of 1521, wherein Piacenza was guaranteed to the papal chair. The emperor drew attention to the word "Investiture," by which he declared that the Empire had reserved its sovereign rights. Paul replied that the word was not used in its feudal import on that occasion. The emperor did not continue the discussion of rights, but declared that his conscience would not permit him to resign the city.²

¹ "Hazer intender a V. M. como en el Interim ay 7 o 8 heregias:" Mendoza, 10 Juni, 1548. In the Lettere del Commendator Annibal Caro scritte al nome del C^l. Farnese, which are otherwise composed with great reserve, will be found, i. 65, another letter respecting the Interim, to Cardinal Sfondrato, wherein it is said—"The emperor has caused a scandal in Christendom, and might have been better employed."

² Lettere del Cardinal Farnese scritte al Vescovo di Fano, Nuntio all' Imperatore Carlo: Informationi Politiche, xix., together with certain instructions from the pope and Farnese, throw light on these transactions, of which I can only intimate the most striking features.

Very willingly would the pope have taken up arms at that moment. Gladly would he have united himself with France, and called his adherents into action. The intrigues of these last did indeed make themselves felt at Naples, Genoa, Siena, Piacenza, and even in Orbitello. Fain would Paul have revenged himself by some unexpected onslaught; but, on the other hand, there ever rose before him the formidable power of the emperor, whose influence he dreaded, more especially in ecclesiastical affairs. He was even beset by apprehensions lest a council should be called, not only inimical to his interests, but that might even proceed to his deposition. We are assured by Mendoza, that the attempted assassination of Ferrante Gonzaga by those Corsican bravoes before named had alarmed him to excess.

Whatever may have been the truth as regards these things, it is certain that he remained inactive, and concealed his rage. The Farnesi were not altogether dissatisfied at seeing Charles take possession of Siena; they hoped to have it ceded to themselves in compensation for their losses. The most singular proposals were made respecting this city. "If the emperor agrees to this," said they to Mendoza, "the pope must re-establish the council in Trent, and not only proceed in other respects according to the emperor's desires, (as, for example, by acknowledging his right to Burgundy,) but also declare Charles his successor on the papal throne. For," say they, "the climate of Germany is cold, that of Italy is warm; and, for a man who suffers from the gout as the emperor does, warm countries are more healthful."¹ I will not maintain that these absurdities were uttered in earnest, for the old pope was firmly persuaded that he should outlive the emperor; but all this serves to show on how doubtful a path the policy of the Farnesi was conducting them, how widely they were departing from the established order of things.

The French meanwhile did not fail to perceive these movements, and the papal negotiations with the emperor.

¹ Cardinal Gambara made this proposal to Mendoza, at a private meeting in a church. He said, at least, "que havia scripto al papa algo desto y no lo havia tomado mal" [that he had written something of the kind to the pope, who had not taken it ill].

A letter is extant from the constable Montmorency, wherein he speaks with the utmost indignation of their practices, using the most unqualified terms as to the dissimulations, lies, and villainous tricks practised in Rome against the king of France.¹

At length, that he might not lose all his labour, but might gain at least one firm point in the midst of these struggles, the pope resolved, since Piacenza was refused, not to the claims of his house only, but to those of the Church as well, that the duchy should at once be restored to the latter. It was the first time that Paul had conceived any project adverse to the interests of his grandsons, but he felt no doubt of their acquiescence, having always believed himself to exercise an absolute authority over them, and frequently alluding in terms of praise and self-gratulation to their ready obedience. There was, however, a material change of circumstances on this occasion, for whereas he had hitherto been acting constantly with a view to their obvious interests, he was now proposing a measure directly at variance with them.² In the first instance they attempted to divert him from his purpose. They caused it to be notified to his holiness, that the day fixed for holding the consistory was an unlucky one, being St. Roque's day. Next they represented that the exchange he contemplated, of Camerino for Piacenza, "would not result to the advantage of the Church." These efforts failing, they retorted on him the arguments he had himself used on a former occasion; but with all this, they could not prevent the fulfilment of his purpose, and at best effected but a short delay. The governor of Parma, Camillo Orsini, was finally commanded by Paul III to hold that city in the name of the Church, and to deliver it to no other hands. After this declaration, which left no room for doubt or hope, the Farnesi restrained themselves no longer. They would on no consideration permit themselves to be despoiled of a dukedom which placed them on a level with the independent sovereigns of Italy. In despite of the pontiff, Ottavio made an attempt to get Parma into his hands by force or stratagem. The prudence and determination of Camillo defeated his purpose, but how painful must have been the feelings of Paul when this attempt was reported to him! That it should be reserved for him in his old age to see his grandsons rebelling against him; that those towards whom he had felt so partial an affection, and on whose account he had incurred the reproaches of the world, should now become his enemies, this was bitter indeed. Even the failure of his enterprise did not deter Ottavio from his purpose. He wrote in plain terms to the pope, that if Parma were not given into his possession, he would conclude a peace with Ferrante Gonzaga, and seek to make himself master of it by aid of the imperial troops; and in effect, his negotiations with that mortal enemy of his house, had already proceeded to some extent; a courier had been despatched with definite proposals to the emperor.¹ Loudly did the pope complain that he was betrayed by his own kindred, whose conduct was such as must bring him to his grave. Above all he was most deeply wounded by a report which prevailed, to the effect that he had himself a secret understanding with Ottavio, in whose enterprise he was taking a part directly opposed to the spirit of his professions. To the Cardinal d'Este he declared that no event of his life had given him so much pain as this, not even the seizure of Piacenza, not even the death of his son Pier Luigi; but that he would not leave the world any doubt as to his real sentiments.² His only consolation was, that at least the Cardinal Alessandro Farnese was innocent, and devoted to his interests. Gradually he awoke to the conviction that he also, the man in whom he trusted implicitly, and to whose hands was committed the whole conduct of affairs, was but too well acquainted with these transactions, and but too readily consenting to them. This discovery broke his heart. On the day of All Souls (Nov. 2, 1549) he made it known to the Venetian ambassador in bitter grief of heart. The day following, seeking relief for his troubled thoughts, he went to his vigna on Monte Cavallo, but the repose he hoped for was not to be found. He caused the Cardinal Alessandro to be summoned to his presence; one word led to another, till the pontiff became violently enraged; he tore his nephew's cap from his hand, and dashed it to the ground.¹ The court was already anticipating a change, and it was generally believed that the cardinal would be removed from the administration. But the event terminated differently. So violent an agitation of mind at the advanced age of eighty-three, proved fatal to the pope himself. He fell ill immediately, and expired in a few days (on the 10th of Nov. 1549).

¹ Le Connestable, au Roy, 1 Sept. 1548 : (Ribier, ii. 155). "Le pape avec ses ministres vous ont jusques-icy usé de toutes dissimulations, lesquelles ils ont depuis quelque temps voulu couvrir de pur mensonge, pour en former une vraye meschanceté, puisqu'il faut que je l'appelle ainsi."

² Dandolo also asserts his positive determination : "S.S. era al tutto volta a restituir Parma alla chiesa."

¹ Gosselini: Vita di Ferr. Gonzaga, p. 65.

² Hippolyt, Cardinal de Ferrare, au Roy, 22 Oct. 1549: Ribier, ii. p. 248: "S. S. m'a assuré n'avoir en sa vie eu chose, dont elle ait tant receu d'ennuy, pour l'opinion qu'elle craint, qu'on veuille prendre que cecy ait esté de son consentement."

All classes of the people crowded to pay respect to his remains and to kiss the foot of their departed sovereign. He was as much beloved as his grandsons were hated; the manner of his death also, which was manifestly caused by those for whose welfare he had been so constantly solicitous, awakened universal compassion.

This pontiff was distinguished by many and varied talents; he possessed extraordinary sagacity, his position was one of supreme elevation; but how impotent, how insignificant does even the most exalted of mortals appear, when placed in contrast with the grand and ceaseless course of events. In all that he proposes or can effect he is limited and held back by the span of time, which bounds his view, and which yet, with its transitory interests, is to him as the weight of eternity; he is besides fettered by the personal considerations incident to his position; these occupy his every hour, occasionally, perhaps, to his comfort and enjoyment, but more frequently to his sorrow and regret; thus is he but too often overborne by his cares. He departs, but the destinies of humanity make no pause, they move on to their completion.

¹ Dandolo: "Il Rev^{mo}. Farnese si risolve di non voler che casa sua restasse priva di Roma e se ne messe alla forte.—S. S. accortasi di questa contraoperatione del Rev^{mo}. Farnese me la comunicò il dì de' morti, in gran parte con grandissima amaritudine, et il dì dietro la mattina per tempo se ne andò alla sua vigna di Monte Cavallo per cercar transtullo, dove si incolerò per tal causa con esso Rev^{mo}. Farnese. Gli fu trovato tutto l'interiore nettissimo, d'haver a viver ancor qualche anno, se non che nel core tre gocce di sangue agghiacciato, (this is evidently an error), giudicati dal moto della colera." [Internally he was found in the most healthy state, and as one likely to live some years; but there were three drops of coagulated blood in his heart, judged to have been caused by the movements of anger.]

2. JULIUS III—MARCELLUS II

A group of cardinals had assembled around the altar of the chapel during the conclave; they were talking of the difficulties that presented themselves in the choice of a pope. "Take me," said one of the number, Cardinal Monte, "and the next day I will choose you for my favourites and intimates from the whole college of cardinals." "What say you? Shall we really elect him?" inquired another, Sfondrato, as they were about to separate.¹ Monte was considered irascible and impetuous, in many other respects too he was an unlikely choice. "Few bets would be taken on his chance," says a writer of the day. It nevertheless did so happen that he was elected (on the 7th of February, 1550). He had formerly been chamberlain to Julius II, and in his memory he took the name of Julius III.

Duke Cosimo had largely contributed to this election; and when it became known at the imperial court, every face was lighted up with joy. For to the high pre-eminence of power and fortune, to which the emperor had attained, was now to be added the ascent of the papal throne by a man whom he might firmly calculate on finding devoted to his interests. It seemed probable that public affairs would now take another course.

The emperor still adhered firmly to his wish for the re-establishment of the council at Trent, still hoping to compel the attendance of the Protestants and their submission to its authority. The new pope assented cordially to this proposal. He set forth the difficulties that were in fact inseparable from the whole affair, but was extremely solicitous to prevent his caution from being considered a mere subterfuge; he made repeated declarations that this was not the case, and affirmed that having acted through his whole life without dissimulation, he would continue to do so. He decreed the re-assemblage of the council of Trent, and fixed the period in the spring of 1551, intimating that he did so "without compact or condition."¹

¹ Dandolo, Relatione, 1551: "Questo Rev^{mo}. di Monte se ben subito in consideratione di ogn' uno, ma all' incontro ogn' uno parlava tanto della sua colera e subitezza che ne passò mai che di pochissima scommessa."

The assent of the pope was then fully secured, but there was still much to be achieved.

At the instance of Julius, a decree of the Sacred College had reinstated Ottavio Farnese in the possession of Parma; the emperor was not averse to this, negotiations had been for some time in progress, and there was good hope of a fair understanding between them. But Charles could not resolve on resigning Piacenza also, and even retained such places as Gonzaga had seized in the territory of Parma. Thus Ottavio continued to maintain himself in the attitude of war.² So many injuries had been committed, so many offences offered by each to the other, that return to mutual confidence was impossible. The death of Paul had doubtless deprived his grandsons of an important support, but it had also given them freedom. No longer compelled to act in accordance with the general interest, or with that of the Church, their measures might now be calculated exclusively with regard to their own advantage. We still find Ottavio possessed by feelings of bitter hatred. He insists that his enemies are seeking to force Parma from his grasp, and even to rid their hands of his own life, but he declares "that they shall succeed neither in the one nor the other."³

¹ Lettere del Nunzio Pighino, 12 e 15 Aug. 1550: Inform. Polit. xix.

² Gossellini, Vita di Ferr. Gonzaga, and the justification of Gonzaga, from the accusation of having caused the war (in the third book) give an authentic explanation to this turn of affairs.

³ Lettere delli Signori Farnesiani per lo negotio di Parma: Informatt. Pol. xix. The above is from a letter of Ottavio to Cardinal Alessandro Farnese, Parma, March 24th, 1551.

It was in this conviction and in such temper that he turned himself to King Henry II of France. It was a moment when he might expect the greatest success.

Italy and Germany were filled with malcontents. What the emperor had already effected, whether in religious or political affairs, with what it was still expected he would do, had raised him up innumerable enemies. Henry II determined to carry forward the anti-Austrian purposes of his father; he gave a truce to his wars with England, formed an alliance with Ottavio, and took the garrison of Parma into his pay. French troops soon appeared in Mirandola also, and the banners of France were seen to wave in the very heart of Italy.

Pope Julius adhered steadily to the emperor in this new complication of affairs. He thought it intolerable "that a miserable worm, Ottavio Farnese, should presume to contend with an emperor and a pope." "It is our will," he declares to his nuncio, "to embark in the same ship with his imperial majesty, and to entrust ourselves to the same fortune." We leave to him, who has the power and the wisdom, the determination of the course."¹ The desire of the emperor was, that measures should be adopted for the immediate and forcible expulsion of the French and their adherents. The imperial and papal troops united, soon took the field, an important fortress of the Parmeggiano fell into their hands, they laid the whole region in ruins, and invested Mirandola on all sides.

It was not, however, in these partial hostilities that the power could be found to suppress the agitations that had indeed originated here, but were now felt throughout Europe. Troops were in action on every frontier where the dominions of France met those of the emperor. War had broken out by land and sea. The German Protestants had at length allied themselves with the French, and the weight they cast into the scale was something very different from that of the Italians. From this union there resulted an assault more determined than any that Charles had ever before sustained; the French were in force on the Rhine, the elector Maurice appeared in the Tyrol. The veteran conqueror, who had taken up his position on the mountain region between Italy and Germany, for the purpose of holding both in allegiance, suddenly found his post one of the utmost jeopardy,—his enemies were victorious, and himself on the point of becoming a prisoner.

¹ Julius Papa III manu propria. Istruttione per voi Monsignor d'Imola con l'Imperatore. L'ultimo di Marzo. Informatt. Pol. xii. He gives the cause of this close union: "Non per affetto alcuno humano, ma perchè vedemo la causa nostra esse con S. M^a. Cesarea in tutti li affari e massimamente in quello della religione." [Not for any human affection, but because we see that our cause is one with his Imperial majesty's, more especially in affairs of religion.]

The affairs of Italy were instantly affected by this state of things. "Never could we have believed," said the pope, "that God would so visit us."¹ He was compelled to make a truce with his enemies in April, 1552.

Mischances sometimes occur that seem not wholly unwelcome to the man they affect; they give pause to a course of action no longer in harmony with his inclinations; they provide him with a legitimate cause, or at the least afford an obvious excuse, for departing from it.

It would almost appear that Julius felt his tribulation to be of this character; the sight of his states filled with troops, and his treasury drained of its resources, had already become oppressive and painful to him; nor did he always think himself well treated by the imperial ministers.² The council, too, was presenting him with matter for serious uneasiness. Since the appearance of the German deputies, to whom promises of reformation had been given, the proceedings had assumed a bolder aspect. Even so early as Jan. 1552, Pope Julius complained that efforts were being made to rob him of his authority; the Spanish bishops sought to reduce the chapters to a state of servile subjection on the one hand, while they desired to deprive the Holy See of the presentation to benefices on the other. But he affirmed his resolve to endure no invasion of his rights; under the title of an abuse, he would not permit those prerogatives to be torn from him that were no abuse, but an essential attribute of his legitimate power.¹ Affairs standing thus, the attack of the Protestants, by which the council was broken up, could not have been altogether displeasing to the pope. He lost no time in decreeing the suspension of the assembly, and thus freed himself from disputes and pretensions innumerable.

¹ Al Cl. Crescentio, 13th April, 1552.

² Lettera del Papa a Mendoc a, 26th Dec. 1551: Informatt. Politiche, xix.: "Be it said without pride, we do not stand in need of counsel; we might even help others in that respect: assistance indeed we might require."

From that time Julius III never applied himself earnestly to political affairs. It is true that the people of Siena, whose townsman he was by the mother's side, accused him of supporting Duke Cosimo in his attacks on their freedom; but the falsehood of this accusation was proved by a subsequent judicial inquiry. It was rather Cosimo who had cause for complaint, the pope having taken no steps to prevent the Florentine exiles—the most inveterate enemies of this his ally—from assembling and arming themselves within the states of the Church.

The villa of "Papa Giulio," at the Porta del Popolo, is still visited by the stranger.² Restored to the presence of those times, he ascends the spacious steps to the gallery, whence he overlooks the whole extent of Rome, from Monte Mario, with all the windings of the Tiber. The building of this palace, the laying out of these gardens, were the daily occupation and continual delight of Pope Julius. The plan was designed by himself, but was never completed; every day brought with it some new suggestion or caprice, which the architects must at once set themselves to realize. Here the pontiff passed his days, forgetting all the rest of the world. He had promoted the advancement of his connections to a very fair extent: Duke Cosimo had conferred on them the domains of Monte Sansovino, which was the cradle of their race; the emperor had invested them with Novara; and he had himself bestowed on them the dignities of the ecclesiastical states and Camerino. A certain favourite he had made cardinal, in fulfilment of a promise. This was a young man who had caught the pope's attention in Parma, when, being but a child, he was seized by an ape, and displayed so much courage, that Julius, pleased with his conduct, adopted and brought him up, always shewing him great affection; but unhappily this constituted his only merit.

¹ Al Cardinal Crescentio, 16th Jan. 1552: "Non sarà vero," he exclaims, "non comportaremo mai, prima lassaremo ruinare il mondo." [It never shall happen, we will never endure it, we will rather let the whole world go to ruin.]

² Vasari. Boissard describes its extent at that time: "Occupat fere omnes colles qui ab urbe ad pontem Milvium protenduntur." He celebrates their splendour, and gives us some of their inscriptions; for example—"Honeste voluptarier cunctis fas honestis esto." And, especially—"Dehinc proximo in templo Deo ac divo Andreae gratias agunto (the visitors, I imagine) vitamque et salutem Julio III Pont^{ci}. Maximo, Balduino ejus fratri, et eorum familie universae plurimam et aeternam precantor." Julius died on the 23rd March, 1555.

The pontiff desired to forward the interests of his family, and those of his favourite; but he was not inclined to involve himself in dangerous perplexities on their account. The pleasant and blameless life of his villa was that which, as we have said, was best suited to him. He gave entertainments, which he enlivened with proverbial and other modes of expression, that sometimes mingled blushes with the smiles of his guests. In the important affairs of the Church and State he took no other share than was absolutely inevitable.

Under such circumstances, it is manifest that neither Church nor State could greatly prosper. The discord between the two great Catholic powers became ever more and more dangerous and threatening; the German Protestants had recovered themselves effectually from their defeat of 1547, and now displayed a more imposing aspect than they had ever before assumed. Of the Catholic reformation so often looked for, there could now be no further hope; the fact would not permit concealment—the prospects of the Roman church were, in all directions, ambiguous and gloomy.

But if, as we have seen, there had arisen in the bosom of that church a more severe spirit of action, a feeling intensely reprobating the whole life and conduct of so many of her chiefs, would not this at length affect the choice of the pontiff? So much was always dependent on the personal character of the pope! for this cause it was that the supreme dignity was made elective; since thus it might be hoped that a man truly representing the prevalent spirit of the Church would be placed at the head of her government.

The more strict religious party possessed no preponderating influence in the Church until after the death of Julius III. That pontiff had frequently felt himself restrained, and his undignified demeanour reproved, by the presence of Cardinal Marcello Cervini. It was on this prelate that the choice fell. He ascended the papal seat on the 11th of April, 1555, as Marcellus II.

The whole life of the new pontiff had been active, and free from the shadow of reproach ; that reform in the Church, of which others only talked, he had exemplified in his own person. "I had prayed," says a contemporary, "that a pope might be granted to us by whom those words of fair import, church, council, reform, might be raised from the contempt into which they had fallen : by this election my hopes received fulfilment, my wish seemed to have become a reality."¹ "The opinion," says another, "entertained of this pope's worth and incomparable wisdom, inspired the world with hope. If ever it be possible for the Church to extinguish heresy, to reform abuse, and compel purity of life, to heal its divisions, and once again be united, it is by Marcellus that this will be brought about."² Thus it was that Marcellus commenced his reign. All his acts were in the same spirit. He would not permit his kindred to approach the capital ; he made various retrenchments in the expenditure of the court ; and is said to have prepared a memorial of the different ameliorations that he proposed to effect in the ecclesiastical institutions. His first effort was to restore divine worship to its due solemnity ; all his thoughts were of reform, and the council needful to that effect.³ In political affairs he determined on a neutrality, by which the emperor was perfectly satisfied. "But the world," as his contemporaries remark, "was not worthy of him." They apply to the pontiff those words of Virgil relating to another Marcellus : "Fate permitted the world to have sight of him only." On the twenty-second day of his pontificate he died.

¹ Seripando al Vescovo di Fiesole : Lettere di Principi, iii. 162.

² Lettere di Principi, iii. 141. The editor is here speaking in his own person.

³ Petri Polidori de Vita Marcelli II Commentarius, 1744, p. 119.

We can say nothing of the results produced by so short an administration. But even this commencement, this election even, suffices to shew the spirit that was beginning to prevail. It continued predominant in the next conclave, and was exemplified in the choice of the most rigid among all the cardinals. Giovanni Pietro Caraffa came forth from that assembly as pope, on the 23rd of May, 1555.

3. PAUL IV

Frequent mention has already been made of this pontiff, who is the same Caraffa, the founder of the Theatines, the restorer of the Inquisition, and the speaker who so essentially contributed to the confirmation of the ancient doctrines in the council of Trent. If there were a party whose purpose it was to reinstate Catholicism in all its strictness, not only was it a member of that party, but its founder and chief who now ascended the papal throne. Paul IV had already completed his seventy-ninth year, but his deep-set eyes still retained all the fire of youth: he was extremely tall and thin, walked with rapid steps, and seemed all nerve and muscle. His personal habits were subjected to no rule or order; frequently he passed the night in study, and slept in the day,—woe then to the servant who should enter the apartment before his bell had rung. In all things it was his custom to follow the impulse of the moment;¹ but this impulse was regulated by a mood of mind formed in the practice of a long life, and become a second nature. He seemed to acknowledge no other duty, no other occupation, than the restoration of the Catholic faith to all its primitive authority. Characters of this description arise from time to time, and are occasionally to be seen even in the present day. Their perceptions of life and the world are gained from a single point of view; the peculiar disposition of their mind is so powerful that all their opinions are tinctured and governed by it; indefatigable speakers, their manner derives a certain freshness from the earnestness of their souls, and the system of thought that, as by a kind of fatality, informs and rules their whole being, is poured forth in a stream inexhaustible. How powerfully do such men act on all around them, when placed in a position wherein their activity is in perfect harmony with their views and sentiments, wherein the power to act is associated with the will! What might men not expect from Paul IV, whose views and opinions had never endured either concession or compromise, but were ever carried out eagerly to their utmost consequences, now that he was raised to the supreme dignity! ¹ He was himself amazed at having reached this point,—he who had in no manner conciliated a single member of the conclave, and from whom nothing was to be expected but the extreme of severity. He believed that his election had been determined, not by the cardinals, but by God himself, who had chosen him for the accomplishment of his own purposes.²

¹ Relatione di M. Bernardo Navagero (che fu poi cardinale) alla Ser^{ma}. Rep^{ca}. di Venetia, tornando di Roma Ambasciatore appresso del Pontefice Paolo IV, 1558: in many Italian libraries, and in the Informationi Politiche in Berlin: "La complessione di questo pontefice è colerica adusta: ha una incredibil gravità e grandezza in tutte le sue azioni, et veramente pare nato al signoreggiare." [The complexion of this pontiff is adust and choleric; he has incredible gravity and grandeur in all his actions, and seems really born to command.]

“We do promise and swear,” says he in the bull that he

¹ It will be readily believed that his character did not secure the approbation of all the world. Aretino's Capitolo al Re di Francia describes him thus:

“Caraffa, ipocrita infingardo,
Che tien per coscienza spirituale
Quando si mette de pepe in sul cardo.”

[Caraffa, the lazy hypocrite, who makes a matter of conscience about peppering a thistle.]

² Relatione del C^{mo}. M. Aluise Mocenigo K. ritornato dalla Corte di Roma, 1560 (Arch. Venez.): “Fu eletto pontefice contra il parer e credere di ogn' uno e forse anco di se stesso, come S. S. propria mi disse poco inanzi morisse, che non avea mai compiaciuto ad alcuno e che se un cardinale gli avea domandato qualche gratia gli avea sempre riposto alla riversa, nè mai compiaciuto, onde disse: io non so come mi habbiano eletto papa, e concludo che Iddio faccia li pontefici.”

published on his accession to the Holy See, "to make it our first care that the reform of the universal Church, and of the Roman court, be at once entered on." The day of his coronation was signalized by the promulgation of edicts respecting monasteries and the religious orders. He sent two monks from Monte Cassino into Spain, with command to re-establish the discipline of the convents which had become lax and neglected. He appointed a congregation for the promotion of reforms in general; this consisted of three classes, in each of which were eight cardinals, fifteen prelates, and fifty learned men of differing ranks.

The articles to be discussed by them, in relation to the appointments to clerical offices and collation to benefices, were submitted to the universities. It is manifest that the new pope proceeded with great earnestness in the work of reform.¹ The spiritual tendency which had hitherto affected the lower ranks of the hierarchy only, now seemed to gain possession of the papal throne itself, and promised to assume the exclusive guidance of all affairs during the pontificate of Paul IV.

But now came the question of what part he would take in relation to the general movements of the political world.

The principal direction once given to a government, and gradually become identified with its very existence, is not readily susceptible of change.

A desire to deliver themselves from the heavy preponderance of Spain must ever have been uppermost in the minds of the popes; and at the accession of Paul the moment seemed to have come when this wish appeared to be within the possibility of realization. The war proceeding, as we have seen, from the movements of the Farnesi, was the most unfortunate one ever undertaken by Charles V. He was closely pressed in the Netherlands; Germany had deserted his interests; Italy was no longer faithful to him; he could not rely even on the houses of Este and Gonzaga; he was himself ill, and weary of life. I question whether any pontiff, not immediately attached to the imperial party, could have found strength to withstand the temptations presented by this state of things.

¹ Bromato, Vita di Paolo IV, lib. ix. § ii., § xvii. (ii. 224, 289).

In the case of Paul IV they were more than commonly powerful. Born in the year 1476, he had seen his native Italy in all the unrestrained freedom of her fifteenth century, and his very soul clung to this remembrance. He would sometimes compare the Italy of that period to a well-tuned instrument of four strings,—these last being formed by Naples, Milan, Venice, and the States of the Church. He would then utter maledictions on the memory of Alfonso and Lodovico il Moro: "Lost and unhallowed souls," as he said, "whose discords had disturbed that harmony."¹ That from their time the Spaniard should have become master in the land, was a thought that he could in no way learn to bear. The house of Caraffa, whence he derived his birth, was attached to the French party, and had frequently taken arms against the Castilians and Catalonians. In 1528 they again joined the French; and it was Giovanni Pietro Caraffa who advised Paul III to seize Naples in 1547. To this party spirit came other causes in aid: Caraffa had constantly affirmed that Charles favoured the Protestants from jealousy of the pope, and that "the successes of those heretics were attributable to no other than the emperor."² Charles knew Caraffa well; he once expelled him from the council formed for the administration of affairs in Naples, and would never permit him to hold peaceful possession of his ecclesiastical employments within that kingdom; he had, moreover, made earnest remonstrance against Caraffa's declamations in the consistory. All these things, as may readily be supposed, did but increase the virulence of the pope's enmity. He detested the emperor as Neapolitan and as Italian, as Catholic and as pope: there existed in his soul no other passions than that for reform of the Church and his hatred of Charles.

The first act of Paul was to lighten various imposts, and to permit the importation of corn. A statue was erected to him for these benefits, and it was not without a certain sense of self-complacency that he viewed this, while,—in the midst of his splendid court, and surrounded by a glittering body of Neapolitan nobles, proffering him the most obsequious obedience,—he received the homage of ambassadors who came crowding from all countries to his presence. But scarcely had he felt himself well-seated on the pontifical chair, than he commenced a series of disputes with the emperor. That monarch had complained to the cardinals of his party, that a pope so inimical to himself had been chosen; his adherents held suspicious meetings; some of them even carried off certain ships from Cività Vecchia, that had previously been taken from them by the French.¹ The pope at once breathed fire and flames. Such of his vassals, and the cardinals, as were imperialists, he arrested instantly, confiscating the whole property of those who fled. Nor was this enough. The alliance with France which Paul III never could resolve on completing, was entered into with little hesitation by Paul IV. He declared that the emperor designed to “finish him by a sort of mental fever,” but that he, Paul, was “determined on open fight. With the help of France he would yet free this poor Italy from the tyrannies of Spain, and did not despair of seeing two French princes ruling in Naples and Milan.” He would sit for long hours over the black thick fiery wine of Naples, called mangiaguerra, his usual drink,² and pour

¹ "Infelici quelle anime di Alfonso d'Aragona e Ludovico duca di Milano, che furono li primi che guastarono così nobil instrumento d'Italia" [who first spoiled that noble instrument Italy].—Navagero.

² Memoriale dato a Annibale Rucellai, Sept. 1555 (Informatt. Pol. tom. xxiv.): "Chiamava liberamente la M^a, S. Cesareja fautore di heretici e di scismatici."

¹ Istruttioni e Lettere di Monsignor della Casa a nome del Cl. Caraffa, dove si contiene il principio della rottura della guerra fra Papa Paolo IV e l'Imperatore Carlo V, 1555. Also in the Informatt. Polit. xxiv.

² Navagero: “L'ordine suo è sempre di mangiare due volte il giorno: vuol esser servito molto delicatamente, e nel principio del pontificato 25 piatti non bastavano: beve molto più di quello che mangia: il vino è potente e gagliardo, negro e tanto spesso che si potria quasi tagliare, dimandasi mangiaguerra, che si conduce del regno di Napoli: dopo pasto sempre beve malvagia, che i suoi chiamano lavarsi i denti. Stava a mangiare in pubblico come gli altri pontefici, sino all' ultima indisposizione, che fu riputata mortale, quando perdette l'appetito: consumava qualche volta tre hore di tempo dal sedere al levarsi da mensa, entrando in varii ragionamenti, secondo l'occasione, et usando molte volte in quel impeto a dir molte cose secrete e d'importanza.” [His custom is to eat twice a day, he must be served very forth torrents of stormy eloquence, against those schismatics and heretics, those accursed of God, that evil generation of Jews and Moors, that scum of the world, and other titles equally complimentary, bestowed with unsparing liberality on every thing Spanish;¹ but he consoled himself with the promise, "thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder, the young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under foot." The time was now come when the Emperor Charles and King Philip should receive the punishment due to their iniquities. He, the pope, would inflict it, and would free Italy from their grasp. If others would not listen to nor support him, the future world should at least have to tell, how an old Italian, so near to his grave, and who should rather have been employed in preparing for it, had entertained these lofty purposes. We will not enter into the details of the negotiations which he carried on under the influence of these feelings. When the French concluded a truce with Spain,² unmindful of an agreement that they had delicately; and in the beginning of his pontificate, twenty-five dishes were not sufficient for his table: he drinks much more than he eats, his wine being strong and heady—it is a black wine grown in the kingdom of Naples, called mangiaguerra, and is so thick that one may almost cut it. After his meals he drinks malmsey, and this his people call "washing his teeth." He used to eat in public like other popes, till his last indisposition, which was considered mortal, when he lost his appetite. He often spent three hours at table in talk of various matters, according to the occasion, and in the heat of this he sometimes uttered things of secrecy and importance.]

¹ Navagero: "Mai parlava di S. M^a. e della nazione Spagnola, che non gli chiamasse eretici, scismatici, e maladetti da Dio, seme di Giudei e di Mori, feccia del mondo, deplorando la miseria d'Italia, che fosse astretta a servire gente così abietta e così vile." The despatches of the French ambassadors are full of these outbreaks; those, for example, of De Lansac and D'Avançon, in Ribier, ii. 610—618.

² The account of the incredulity expressed by the Caraffa, when this truce was first named to them, as given by Navagero, is extremely characteristic: "Domandando io al pontefice et al Cl. Caraffa, se havevano avviso alcuno delle tregue (of Vaucelles) si guardarono l'un l'altro ridendo, quasi volessero dire, sì come mi disse anche apertamente il pontefice, che questa speranza di tregue era assai debole in lui, e nondimeno venne l'avviso il giorno seguente, il quale sì come consolò tutta Roma così diede tanto travaglio e tanta molestia al papa et al cardinale, che non lo poterono dissimulare. Diceva il papa che queste tregue sarebbero la ruina del mondo." [Asking the pope and Cardinal Caraffa if they had received intelligence of the truce; they looked at each other entered into with himself, he sent his nephew, Carlo Caraffa, to France, where the different parties contending for power in that country were gradually gained over to his interests. The Montmorencies and the Guises, the wife of the French king and his mistress, were equally won to aid the pontiff in promoting a new outbreak of hostilities.¹ Paul secured a vigorous Italian ally also in the person of the duke of Ferrara; nothing less was talked of than completely revolutionizing Italy. Neapolitan and Florentine exiles filled the Curia; their restoration to their homes seemed now approaching; the papal fiscal instituted a legal process against the Emperor Charles and King Philip, in which the excommunication of those princes, and the release of their subjects from their oath of allegiance, was roundly threatened. The Florentines always declared that they held positive evidence of a design to include the house of Medici in the downfall of the Spanish power.² Active preparations were everywhere made for war, and the whole character of the century seemed about to suffer change, and become matter of question.

But meanwhile how different a position was this pontificate assuming from that which it had been expected to take up! All purposes of reform were set aside for the struggles of war, and these last entailed consequences of a totally opposite character.

The pontiff, who, as cardinal, had most sternly opposed the abuses of nepotism, and had denounced them even to his own peril, was now seen to abandon himself entirely to this weakness. His nephew, Carlo Caraffa, who had passed his whole life amidst the excesses and license of camps,³ was now raised to the rank of cardinal, though Paul himself had often declared of him, that "his arm was dyed in blood to laughing, as if they would say, as indeed the pontiff openly said to me afterwards, that there was but slight hope of that: yet the next day came the news, which so annoyed the pope and cardinal (though it comforted all Rome), that they could not conceal their rage, and Paul said, "This truce will be the ruin of the world."] the elbow." Carlo had found means to gain over the feeble old man; he contrived to be occasionally surprised by him in seeming prayer before the crucifix, and apparently suffering agonies of remorse.¹ But still further was the uncle propitiated by the virulent enmity of his nephew to the Spaniards; this was their true bond of union. Carlo Caraffa had taken military service with the emperor in Germany, but complained that he had met with neglect only as his reward. A prisoner, from whom he expected a large ransom, had been taken from him, nor had he been suffered to hold possession of a priory belonging to the order of Malta, to which he had been nominated. All these things had awakened his hatred and made him thirst for vengeance. This state of feeling, Paul allowed to stand in the place of all the virtues Carlo wanted; he could find no words eloquent enough to praise him, declaring that the papal seat had never possessed a more efficient servant; he made over to him the greater part, not only of the civil, but even of the ecclesiastical administration, and was perfectly satisfied that he should be regarded as the author of whatever acts of favour were received from the court.

¹ Rabutin, Mémoires: Collect. Univers. tom. xxxviii. 358. Especially Mémoires, Villars, ib. tom. xxxv. 277.

² Gussoni: Relatione di Toscana.

³ Babon, in Ribier, ii. 745. Villars, p. 255.

On his other nephews the pontiff would not for some time bestow a glance of kindness; it was not until they had evinced their participation in his anti-Spanish mania, that they were received to his grace.² Never could any one have anticipated what he next did. Declaring that the Colonna, "those incorrigible rebels against God and the Church," however frequently deprived of their castles, had always managed to regain them, he now resolved that this should be amended; he would give those fortresses to vassals who would know how to hold them. Thereupon he divided the possessions of the house of Colonna among his nephews, making the elder duke of Palliano and the younger marquis of Montebello. The cardinals remained silent when he announced these purposes in their assembly ; they bent down their heads and fixed their eyes to the earth. The Caraffa now indulged in the most ambitious projects ; the daughters of their family should marry into that of the French king, or at least into the ducal house of Ferrara ; the sons thought of nothing less than the possession of Siena. To one who spoke jestingly concerning the jewelled cap of a child of their house, the mother of the nephews replied, "We should rather be talking of crowns than caps."¹

¹ Bromato.

² Extractus processûs Cardinalis Caraffae. "Similiter dux Palliani deponit, quod donec se declaraverit contra imperiales, papa eum nunquam vidit grato vultu et bono oculo." [The duke of Palliano also deposes, that until he declared against the imperialists, the pope never shewed him a fair countenance, or viewed him with a good eye.]

And indeed every thing was now depending on the events of the war which then broke out, but which certainly assumed no very promising aspect even from the commencement.

On the act of the fiscal before alluded to, the duke of Alva had pressed forward from the Neapolitan territory into the states of the Church. He was accompanied by the Roman vassals, whose confederates also aroused themselves. The papal garrison was driven out of Nettuno, and the troops of the Colonna recalled. Alva seized Frosinone, Anagni, Tivoli in the mountains, and Ostia on the sea. Rome was thus invested on both sides.

The pope had first placed his reliance on his Romans, and reviewed them in person. They marched from Campofiore, three hundred and forty columns armed with arquebuses, two hundred and fifty with pikes. In each rank stood nine men admirably appointed, presenting a most imposing aspect, and commanded by officers who were exclusively of noble birth. These troops passed before the castle of St. Angelo, which saluted them with its artillery, to the piazza of St. Peter, where the pontiff had stationed himself at a window with his nephews, and as each caporion and standard-bearer passed, his holiness bestowed his blessing.² All this made a very fair show, but these were not the men by whom the city was to be defended. When the Spaniards had approached near the walls, a false alarm, occasioned by a small body of horse, was sufficient to throw them into such perfect confusion, that not one man was found remaining by his colours. The pope saw that he must seek elsewhere for effectual aid, and after a time Pietro Strozzi brought him the troops that were serving before Siena. With these he succeeded in recovering Tivoli and Ostia, thus averting the most imminent danger.

¹ Bromato, ix. 16 ; ii. 286 : literally, "Non esser quel tempo di parlar di berette, ma di corone."

² Diario di Cola Calleine Romano del rione di Trastevere dall' anno 1521 sino all' anno 1562, MS.

But what a war was this !

There are moments in the history of the world when it would seem that the actions of men are influenced by motives in direct opposition to the principles and ideas that usually govern their lives and conduct.

The duke of Alva might, in the first instance, have conquered Rome with very little difficulty ; but his uncle, Cardinal Giacomo, reminded him of the unhappy end to which all had come who had taken part in the conquest under Bourbon. Alva, being a good Catholic, conducted the war with the utmost discretion ; he fought the pope, but did not cease to pay him reverence ; he would fain take the sword from his holiness, but had no desire for the renown of a conqueror of Rome. His soldiers complained that they were led against a mere vapour, a mist and smoke that annoyed them, but which they could neither lay hold on nor stifle at its source.

And who were those by whom the pope was defended against such good Catholics ? The most effective among them were Germans, and Protestants to a man ! They amused themselves with the saintly images on the highways, they laughed at the mass in the churches, were utterly regardless of the fast days, and did things innumerable, for which, at any other time, the pope would have punished them with death.¹ I even find that Carlo Caraffa established a very close intimacy with the great Protestant leader, the Margrave Albrecht of Brandenburg.

¹ Navagero : "Fu riputata la più esercitata gente la Tedesca (3,500 fanti, other MSS. however give different numbers) e più atta alla guerra, ma era in tutto Luterana : la Guascona era tanto insolente, tanto contro l'onore delle donne et in torre la robba. Gli offesi maledicevano pubblicamente chi era causa di questi disordini." [The Germans were considered the best disciplined and most serviceable troops—the Gascons were most insolent : they committed offences against female honour, and were great plunderers. The injured publicly cursed him who was the cause of these disorders.]

Contradictions more perfect, a contrast more complete, than that displayed by these circumstances, could be scarcely imagined. On the one side we have the most fervent spirit of Catholicism, which was at least exemplified in the leader (how different were his proceedings from those of the old Bourbon times!); on the other, was that secular tendency of the papacy, by which even Paul IV, however earnestly condemning it, was seized and borne forward. Thus, it came to pass that the followers of his faith were attacking him, while it was by heretics and seceders that he found himself defended! But the first preserved their allegiance, even while opposing his power; the latter displayed their hostility to and contempt for his person even while in arms to protect him.

It was not until the French auxiliaries crossed the Alps that the contest really began; these consisted of ten thousand foot and a less numerous, but very brilliant body of cavalry. Their leader would most willingly have directed his force against Milan, which he believed to be unprepared for defence, but he was unable to resist the impulse by which the Caraffa forced him towards Naples. The latter were fully confident of finding numberless adherents in their own country, they counted on the assistance of the exiles, and hoped for the rising of their party; if not throughout the kingdom, yet certainly in the Abruzzi and round Aquila and Montorio, where their ancestors had always exercised an important influence, both on the paternal and maternal side.

It was manifest that in one way or another affairs must now arrive at a crisis. The papal power had been too often excited into hostility against the Spanish predominance, not to burst forth eventually without restraint.

The pope and his nephews were determined that matters should proceed to extremity. Not only had Caraffa accepted the aid of the Protestants, he had even made proposals to Solyman I. These were to the effect that the Turkish sovereign should abstain from prosecuting his wars in Hungary, and throw himself with all his force on the Two Sicilies.¹ Thus was a pontiff entreating the help of infidels against a Catholic monarch.

In April, 1557, the papal troops crossed the Neapolitan frontier. Holy Thursday was signalized by the conquest and atrocious pillage of Compli, which was full of treasure, in part belonging to the town, but also partly such as had been carried thither for safety. This done, Guise also crossed the Tronto, and besieged Civitella.

But he found the kingdom fully prepared to baffle his efforts. Alva knew well that there would be no insurrection among the people, so long as he should retain the upper hand in the country. He had received a large grant of money from a parliament of the barons. Queen Bona of Poland, of the ancient family of Aragon, and a bitter enemy of the French, who had shortly before arrived in her duchy of Bari, with much treasure, supplied him with half a million of scudi. The ecclesiastical revenues that should have been sent to Rome he poured into his military chest instead, and even seized the gold and silver of the churches, with the bells of the city of Benevento, all of which he appropriated to his own purposes.² Thus furnished, he proceeded to fortify the towns of the Neapolitan frontier, as also those of the Roman territory that still remained in his hands. His army was composed in the usual manner of Germans, Spaniards, and Italians, but was an extremely formidable one. He also raised Neapolitan centuries under the command of the native nobles. Civitella was bravely defended by Count Santafiore, who had succeeded in rousing the inhabitants to active co-operation, and even to repel an attempt made to take the place by storm.

While the kingdom of Naples thus held firmly to King

¹ His confessions in Bromato: Vita di Paolo IV, tom. ii. p. 369. Bromato also gives us good information respecting the war; which he takes often word for word—a fact he does not conceal—from a voluminous MS. by Nores, which treats circumstantially of this war, and is to be found in many Italian libraries.

² Giannone: Istoria di Napoli, lib. xxxiii. c. i. Gosselini and Mambrino Roseo: Delle Historie del Mondo, lib. vii., who give a minute account of this war, with other writers, agree in attributing to Ferrante Gonzaga a large share in the most able measures taken by Alva.

Philip, and displayed only devotion to his service, the assailants, on the contrary, were weakened by animosities and dissensions. French and Italians, Guise and Montebello, all were in the utmost discord. Guise complained that the pope did not perform his part in the contract between them, and neglected to send him the promised supplies. When the duke of Alva appeared with his army in the Abruzzi, towards the middle of May, Guise found it advisable to raise the siege, and retreat across the Tronto; operations were then again transferred to the Roman territories. And now was seen a war in which both sides advanced and then retreated; invested towns only to resign them, made great movements, in short, but on one occasion only did they come to a serious engagement.

Marc Antonio Colonna made demonstrations against Palliano, which had been taken from him by the pope; seeing which, Giulio Orsini hurried to its relief with provisions and troops; 3,000 Swiss had arrived in Rome under the command of a colonel from Unterwalden. The pope received them with great delight, decorated their officers with gold chains and knightly titles, and declared that this was a legion of angels sent by God for his behoof. These were the troops that, together with a few companies of Italian cavalry and infantry, marched under the command of Giulio Orsini. They were met by the forces of Marc Antonio Colonna, and once more ensued one of those old battles in the manner of the Italian wars of 1494-1531, the papal troops against those of the empire, a Colonna opposing an Orsini; the German landsknechts, under their distinguished leaders, Caspar von Feltz and Hans Walther, stood face to face, as they so often had done, with their ancient antagonists the Swiss. Once again the combatants on either side arrayed themselves for a cause in which neither felt the slightest interest, but for which they none the less fought with determined bravery.¹ Hans Walther at length, "tall and strong," say the Spaniards, "as a giant," threw himself into the midst of a Swiss company. With a pistol in one hand and his naked sword in the other, he rushed upon the standard-bearer, whom he brought down, shooting him in the side, at the same moment that he dealt him a fatal blow on the head. The whole troop fell upon him, but his lanzknechts were already at hand for his support. The Swiss were completely broken and dispersed, their banners, on which had been inscribed in large letters, "Defenders of the faith and of the Holy See," were trampled in the dust, and of the eleven captains that went forth, their commander led two only back to Rome.

¹ I find the details of this little encounter in Cabrera: Don Felipe Segundo, lib. iii. p. 189.

While this miniature war was in progress here, the great armies were in action on the frontier of the Netherlands. The battle of St. Quintin ensued, wherein the Spaniards gained a complete victory. In France men even wondered that they did not at once press forward to Paris, which at that moment they might certainly have taken.¹

Hereupon Henry II writes to Guise, "I hope," he remarks, "that the pope will do as much for me in my need as I did for him in his straits."² So little could Paul now hope from the aid of the French, that it was he on the contrary who was called on to help them. Guise declared, "that no chains would now avail to keep him in Italy,"³ and he instantly hurried with all his forces to the aid of his embarrassed sovereign.

No force remaining that could oppose an obstacle to the imperialists and troops of Colonna, they advanced towards Rome, whose inhabitants once more saw themselves threatened with conquest and plunder. Their condition was all the more desperate from the fact that they had little less to fear from their defenders than from their enemies. During many nights they were compelled to keep lights burning in every window, and through all the streets. A skirmishing party of Spaniards which had reached the gates was frightened back by this demonstration, which was, however, a mere precaution against the papal troops; every one murmured. The Romans wished their pope in his grave a thousand times, and demanded that the Spanish army should be admitted by a formal capitulation.

¹ Monluc : Mémoires, p. 116.

² Le Roy à Mons. de Guise, in Ribier, ii. p. 750.

³ Lettera del Duca di Palliano al C^l. Caraffa, Informatt. Polit. xxii.

So far did Paul IV permit his affairs to come. It was not until every enterprise had completely failed, till his allies were beaten, his states for the greater part invested by the enemy, and his capital a second time menaced with ruin, that he would bend himself to treat for peace.

This was accorded by the Spaniards in the same spirit by which they had been actuated throughout the war. They restored all such fortresses and cities of the Church as had been taken, and even promised compensation for Palliano, which the Caraffa had lost.¹ Alva came to Rome; with the most profound reverence did he now kiss the foot of his conquered enemy, the sworn adversary of his king and nation. He was heard to say that never had he feared the face of man as he did that of the pontiff.

This peace seemed in every way favourable to the papal interest; it was nevertheless utterly fatal to all the projects hitherto cherished by the popedom. Any further attempt to throw off the Spanish yoke must now be abandoned, and accordingly, none such has ever (in the old sense and manner) been again brought forward. The influence of the Spaniards in Milan and Naples had proved unassailable. Their allies were more than ever powerful. There had been hope among the Caraffa of expelling Duke Cosimo from Florence; but this prince had not only held firm his grasp, but had seized on Siena likewise, and was now the possessor of an important sovereignty. By the restitution of Piacenza, the Farnesi had been gained over to Philip II. Marc Antonio Colonna had made himself a brilliant reputation, and had fully restored the ancient lustre of his family. For the pontiff there was nothing left but to resign himself to this position of affairs. Bitter as was this necessity to Paul IV, he yet felt that he must submit; with what feelings it is not difficult to imagine. Philip II being on some occasion called his friend, "Yes," he replied, "my friend who kept me beleaguered, and who thought to have my soul!" It is true that in the presence of strangers he compared Philip to the prodigal son of the gospel, but in the circle of his intimates he took care to mark his estimation of those pontiffs who had designed to raise the kings of France to the imperial throne ;¹ for others he had no praise. His sentiments were what they had always been, but the force of circumstances controlled him. There was nothing more to be hoped for, still less to be undertaken ; he dared not even bemoan himself, unless in the closest secrecy.

¹ A convention was made between Carlo Caraffa and the duke of Alva, regarding Palliano, and this was kept secret not from the public only, but from the pope himself.—Bromato, ii. 385.

When once an event is indeed accomplished, it is altogether useless for a man to struggle against its consequences. Even Paul IV felt this, and after a certain time his thoughts took another direction ; he experienced a reaction which was of the greatest importance, whether as regarded his own administration, or the general transformation brought about in the papal position and system.

Other pontiffs had promoted and favoured their nephews from family affection, or mere selfish ambition to raise the house they sprang from ; the nepotism of Paul had a totally different origin, his nephews were favoured because they assisted his efforts against Spain, and because in this contest he considered them his natural allies ; that once over, the utility of the nephews was at an end. It is only by success that a man is maintained in a position of great eminence, more especially if it be not acquired in a manner altogether legitimate. Cardinal Caraffa had undertaken an embassy to King Philip, principally to promote the interests of his own house, for which he desired to receive the compensation promised in lieu of Palliano. He returned without having accomplished any material purpose, and from that time the pope became ever colder and colder towards him. The cardinal soon perceived that he could no longer decide, as he had hitherto done, who should or should not be about the person of his uncle ; he could no more exclude those who were inimical to himself, and rumours reached the pontiff, by which his unfavourable impressions of former days were revived ; a serious illness once seized the cardinal, and on this occasion his uncle paid him a visit unexpectedly, when he found certain persons with him whose reputation was of the worst possible character. "Old people," said Paul, "are mistrustful, and I there saw things that opened a wide field for my suspicions." It is obvious that only very slight provocation was needed to arouse the storm within him, and this was presented by an occurrence otherwise of little importance. In the new-year's night of 1559, there was a tumult in the streets, during which the young Cardinal Monte, the favourite of Pope Julius before mentioned, drew his sword. This was related to the pontiff the very next morning, and he felt greatly offended with Cardinal Caraffa for not saying a word about it. He waited some days, and then expressed his displeasure. The court, ever delighted with change, caught eagerly at this mark of disgrace. The Florentine ambassador, on whom the Caraffa had inflicted mortifications innumerable, now made his way to the presence, and uttered the most bitter complaints. The Marchese della Valle, one of the pontiff's family, but who had never been allowed access to him, found means to get a note placed in his breviary, in which certain of his nephew's misdeeds were described; "if his holiness should desire further explanations," said this paper, "he has but to sign his name." The pope gave the required signature, and the promised information did not fail to appear.

¹ L'Evesque d'Angoulesme au Roy, 11 Juin, 1558. Ribier, ii. 745. The pope had said—"Que vous, sire, n'estuez pas pour dégénérer de vos prédécesseurs, qui avoient toujours esté conservateurs et défenseurs de ce saint siège ; comme au contraire, que le roy Philippe tenoit de race de le vouloir ruiner et confondre entièrement."

Thus, well provided with causes for resentment, Paul appeared on the 9th of January at the assembly of the Inquisition. He first spoke of the nocturnal riot, reproved Cardinal Monte with extreme severity, and repeatedly thundered forth "Reform! Reform!" The cardinals, usually so silent, had this time the courage to speak. "Holy father," said Cardinal Pacheco, interrupting the sovereign, "reform must first of all begin among ourselves!" The pope was silenced; those words struck him to the heart; the half-formed convictions that had been gradually gaining power within him, were at once changed to palpable certainty; he said nothing more of Cardinal Monte's offences, but shut himself up in his apartment, burning with rage, and thinking only of his nephews. Giving immediate directions that no order proceeding from Cardinal Caraffa should be executed, he sent to demand that minister's papers. Cardinal Vitellozzo Vitelli, who was believed to be in possession of all the Caraffa secrets, was immediately summoned, and compelled to swear that he would disclose all he knew. Camillo Orsini was called from his palace in the Campagna, for the same purpose. Those of the more austere party, who had long remarked the proceedings of the nephews with disapproval, now made themselves heard. The old Theatine, Don Geremia, who was held to be a saint, passed long hours with his holiness, who was made acquainted with circumstances that he had never suspected, and which equally excited his detestation and horror. He fell into a state of pitiable agitation, could neither eat nor sleep, and passed ten days consumed by fever, resulting from distress of mind. At length he was resolved; and then was seen to occur an event for ever memorable, a pope, with self-inflicted violence, tearing asunder the ties that bound him to his kindred. On the 27th of January a consistory was summoned, wherein the evil lives of his nephews were denounced with passionate emotion by the grieving pontiff, who called God and the world to bear witness that he had never known of these misdoings, but had been constantly deceived by those around him. He deprived the accused of all their offices, and condemned them to banishment, together with their families. The mother of the nephews, seventy years old, bent with age, and sinking beneath her infirmities, entreated for them, throwing herself at the pope's feet as he entered the palace; but, though she was herself blameless, he passed her by with harsh words. The young Marchesa Montebello arrived in Rome from Naples at this time; she found her palace closed against her, at the inns they refused to receive her, she went from door to door in the rainy night, and could find no shelter, until in a remote quarter, to which no order had been sent, an innkeeper was found who permitted her to take refuge beneath his roof. Cardinal Caraffa vainly offered to constitute himself the pope's prisoner, and required to have his conduct investigated. Paul commanded the Swiss guard to repel not himself only, but all who, having been in his service, should venture to approach the palace. He made but one exception; this was in favour of a young man, the son of Montorio, whom he loved greatly, and made cardinal in his eighteenth year; this youth he permitted to remain about his person, and take part in his devotional exercises; but he was never allowed to name his banished family, still less to implore their forgiveness; he dared not even hold the slightest intercourse with his father. The misfortunes of his house affected him all the more painfully from this restraint, and the suffering that he was not permitted to express in words, was yet manifest in his face, and legible in his whole person.¹

And would it not be supposed that occurrences of this character must re-act on the mind of the pontiff?

He proceeded as though nothing had happened. Immediately after having pronounced sentence against his kindred with stormy eloquence in the consistory, he betook himself to other business, and while most of the cardinals were paralyzed by fear and astonishment, the pontiff betrayed no emotion. The foreign ambassadors were amazed by this coolness of demeanour. "In the midst of changes so unexpected and so complete," they remarked, "surrounded by ministers and servants all new and strange, he maintains himself steadfastly, unbending and imperturbable; he feels no compassion, and seems not even to retain a remembrance of his ruined house." Henceforth it was to a totally different passion that he surrendered the guidance of his life.

This change was most certainly of the highest importance, and of ever memorable effect. His hatred to the Spaniards, and the hope of becoming the liberator of Italy, had hurried even Paul IV into designs and practices utterly worldly; these had led him to the endowment of his kinsmen with the lands of the Church, and had caused the elevation of a mere soldier to the administration even of ecclesiastical affairs. They had plunged him into deadly feuds and sanguinary hostilities. Events had compelled him to abandon that hope, to suppress that hatred, and then were his eyes gradually opened to the reprehensible conduct of those about him. Against these offenders, after a painful combat with himself, his stern justice prevailed ; he shook them off, and from that hour his early plans of reformation were resumed, he began to reign in the manner that had at first been expected from him. And now, with that impetuous energy which he had previously displayed in his enmities, and in the conduct of his wars, he turned to the reform of the State, and above all to that of the Church.

¹ Much valuable information as to these events may be found in Pallavicini, still more in Bromato. In the Berlin Informationi, there is also, vol. viii., a "Diario d'alcune attioni più notabili nel Pontificato di Paolo IV l'anno 1558, sino alla sua morte" (beginning from the 10th Sept. 1558). This was not known to either of the above writers; it was composed from personal observation, and has supplied me with much information altogether new.

All secular offices, from the highest to the lowest, were transferred to other hands. The existing podestas and governors lost their places, and the manner in which this was effected was occasionally very singular. In Perugia, for example, the newly-appointed governor arrived in the night ; without waiting for daylight, he summoned the Anziani, produced his credentials, and commanded them forthwith to arrest their former governor, who was present. From time immemorial, there had been no pope who governed without nepotism : Paul IV now shewed this example. The places hitherto monopolized by his kinsmen were bestowed on Cardinal Carpi, Camillo Orsini, who had held so extensive a power under Paul III, and others. Nor were the persons only changed, the whole system and character of administration were changed also. Important sums were economized, and taxes to a proportional amount were remitted ; the pontiff established a chest, of which he only held the key, for the purpose of receiving all complaints that any man should desire to make ; he demanded a daily report from the governor. The public business in general was conducted with great circumspection ; nor were any of the old abuses permitted to remain.

Amidst all the commotions prevailing through the early part of his pontificate, Paul IV had never lost sight of his reforming projects ; he now resumed them with earnest zeal and undivided attention. A more severe discipline was introduced into the churches : he forbade all begging ; even the collection of alms for masses, hitherto made by the clergy, was discontinued ; and such pictures as were not, by their subjects, appropriate to the church, he removed. A medal was struck in his honour, representing Christ driving the money-changers from the Temple. All monks who had deserted their monasteries were expelled from the city and states of the Church; the court was enjoined to keep the regular fasts, and all were commanded to solemnize Easter by receiving the Lord's Supper. The cardinals were even compelled to occasional preaching, and Paul himself preached! Many abuses that had been profitable to the Curia he did his best to set aside. Of marriage dispensations, or of the resources they furnished to the treasury, he would not even hear mention. A host of places that, up to his time, had been constantly sold, even those of the clerks of the chamber¹ (chiericati di camera), he would now have disposed of according to merit only. Still more rigidly did he insist on the worth and clerical endowments of all on whom he bestowed the purely ecclesiastical offices. He would no longer endure those compacts by which one man had hitherto been allowed to enjoy the revenues of an office, while he made over its duties to another, by whom, for some mean hire, they were performed, well or ill, as might chance. He had also formed the design of reinstating the bishops in many rights which had been wrongfully withheld from them; and considered it highly culpable that every thing should be absorbed by Rome which could in any way be made to yield either profit or influence.²

Nor were the reforms of Paul confined to the mere abolition of abuses. Not content with a negative effect only, he proceeded to practical amendments. The services of the Church were performed with increased pomp; it is to him we are indebted for the rich ornaments of the Sistine chapel, and for the solemn representation of the Holy Sepulchre.³

¹ Caracciolo, Vita di Paolo IV MS., alludes particularly to these. The pope said: "Che simili officii d'amministrazione e di giustitia conveniva che si dassero a persone che li facessero, e non venderli a chi avesse occasion di volerne cavare il suo danaro." [That such employments of justice and government should be given to those who would perform the duties, and not be sold to people who would only want to get back their money from them.]

² Bromato, ii. 483.

³ Mocenigo, Relatione di 1560; "Nelli officii divini poi e nelle
VOL. I. R

The ideal of the modern service of the Catholic church—full of dignity, devotion, and splendour—floated also before the eyes of Paul.

He permitted no day to pass over, as he boasts, without the promulgation of some edict tending to restore the Church to its original purity. Many of his decrees present the outlines of those ordinances which were afterwards sanctioned by the council of Trent.¹

In the course now adopted, Paul displayed, as might have been expected, all the inflexibility of nature peculiar to him.

Above all other institutions, he favoured that of the Inquisition, which he had himself re-established. The days appointed for the "segnatura" and the consistory he would often suffer to pass unnoticed; but never did he miss the Thursday, which was that set apart for the congregation of the Inquisition, and when it assembled before him. The powers of this office he desired to see exercised with the utmost rigour. He subjected new classes of offence to its jurisdiction, and conferred on it the barbarous prerogative of applying torture for the detection of accomplices. He permitted no respect of persons; the most distinguished nobles were summoned before this tribunal, and cardinals, such as Morone and Foscherari, were now thrown into prison, because certain doubts had occurred to him as to the soundness of their opinions, although these very men had been formerly appointed to examine the contents, and decide the orthodoxy, of important books—the Spiritual Exercises of Loyola, for example. It was Paul IV by whom the festival of San Domenico was established, in honour of that great Inquisitor.

ceremonie procedeva questo pontefice con tanta gravità e devotione che veramente pareva degnissimo vicario de Gesu Christo. Nelle cose poi della religione si prendeva tanto pensiero et usava tanta diligentia che maggior non si poteva desiderare."

¹ Mocenigo: "Papa Paolo IV andava continuamente facendo qualche nova determinazione e riforma, e sempre diceva preparare altre, acciò che restasse manco occasione e menor necessità di far concilio." [Pope Paul was continually making some new resolution in the way of reform, and always said he had others prepared, so that there would be little opportunity and still less necessity for holding a council.]

Thus did a rigid austerity and earnest zeal for the restoration of primitive habits become the prevailing tendency of the popedom.

Paul IV seemed almost to have forgotten that he had ever pursued other purposes than those that now occupied him; the memory of past times seemed extinguished; he lived and moved in his reforms and his Inquisition, gave laws, imprisoned, excommunicated, and held autos-da-fé: these occupations filled up his life. At length, when laid prostrate by disease, such as would have caused death even to a younger man, he called his cardinals about him, commended his soul to their prayers, and the Holy See, with the Inquisition, to their earnest care. Once more would he fain have collected his energies: he sought to raise himself, but the disease prevailed; his strength had failed him,—he fell back and expired (Aug. 18, 1559).

In one respect, at least, are these determined and passionate characters more fortunate than men of feebler mould; they are, perhaps, blinded by the force of their feelings, the violence of their prejudices, but they are also steeled by this force; this violence it is that renders them invincible.

The Roman people did not forget what they had suffered under Paul IV so readily as he had done;—they could not forgive him the war he had brought on the state; nor, though they abhorred his nephews, did their disgrace suffice to the resentment of the multitude. On his death being made known, large crowds assembled on the Capitol, and resolved that, as he had not deserved well either of Rome, or of the world, so would they destroy his monuments. Others attacked the buildings of the Inquisition, set fire to them, and roughly handled the servants of the holy office; they even threatened to burn the Dominican convent of S^{ta} Maria alla Minerva. The Colonna, the Orsini, Cesarini, Massimi, and other nobles whom Paul had mortally offended, took part in these tumults. The statue that had been erected to this pope was torn from its pedestal, broken to pieces, and the head, bearing the triple crown, was dragged through the streets.¹

¹ Mocenigo: "Viddi il popolo correr in furia verso la casa di Ripetta deputata per le cose dell' Inquisitione, metter a sacco tutta la

It would, nevertheless, have been fortunate for the papal see had it met with no more serious reaction against the enterprises of Paul IV than was intimated by this outbreak.

4. REMARKS ON THE PROGRESS OF PROTESTANTISM DURING THE PONTIFICATE OF PAUL IV

It will have become obvious to the reader that the earlier dissensions between the papacy and the Imperial or Spanish power, had contributed more than any other external cause to the establishment of Protestantism in Germany. Yet a second breach was not avoided, and this produced results still more comprehensive and important.

The recall of the papal troops from the imperial army by Paul III, and his transfer of the council from Trent to Bologna, may be considered as the preliminary steps. Their importance was at once made evident: there was no impediment to the subjugation of the Protestants so effectual as that presented by the policy, active and passive, of Paul III at that period.

The great and permanent results of these measures were, however, not obvious until after the death of the pontiff. The connection with France, into which he led his nephews, occasioned a universal war; and in this the German Protestants not only achieved the memorable victory by which they secured themselves for ever from the pope, emperor, and council, but also gained important progress for their opinions by the contact into which the Protestant soldiers, who fought on both sides, were forced with those of France and the Netherlands. This contact caused the extensive robba ch' era dentro, sì di vittualie come d'altra robba, che la maggior parte era del Rev^{mo}. Cl. Alessandrino somme Inquisitore, trattar male con bastonate e ferite tutti i ministri dell' Inquisitione, levar le scritture gettandole a refuso per la strada, e finalmente p'ner foco in quella casa. I frati di S. Domenico erano in tant' odio a quel popolo che in ogni modo volevan abbruciar il monastero della Minerva." He goes on to declare that the nobles were principally to blame in this affair, and says that similar outbreaks occurred in Perugia.

acceptance of the new doctrines in those countries, their introduction being favoured by the prevalence of a confusion, occasioned by the war, which rendered vigilant precaution impossible.

Paul IV ascended the papal throne. It was for him to have taken a clear view of things as existing before his eyes, and, above all, his first efforts should have been turned to the restoration of peace: but with all the blindness of passion, he plunged himself into the tumult, and it thus came to pass that he, the most furious of zealots, was in fact a more effectual promoter of that Protestantism, which he so abhorred and persecuted, than any one of his predecessors.

Let us examine the influence of his conduct on England alone.

The first victory gained by the new opinions in that country was for a long time incomplete: nothing further was required than a retrogression of the government, and the presence of a Catholic sovereign would at once have determined the parliament to subject the national Church once more to the dominion of the pope;—but then the latter must proceed cautiously; he must not wage open war with those innovations that had arisen from the present and recent state of things. This had been at once perceived by Julius III. His first nuncio having instantly remarked the potency of those interests that were connected with the confiscated property of the Church,¹ he magnanimously resolved to make no effort for its restitution. Indeed, the legate was not permitted to land on the English soil until he had given satisfactory assurances in this respect. It was to these declarations that his extensive influence was attributable,—to them was he indebted for the principal part of his success.² This legate, with whom we are already acquainted, was Reginald Pole—the man, above all others, best fitted to labour successfully for the restoration of

¹ Lettere di Mr. Henrico, Nov. 1553, in a MS. entitled “Lettere e Negotiati di Polo,” in which there is much besides of importance to this history. See also Pallavicini as to this matter, xiii. 9, 411.

² He did not hesitate to acknowledge the right of those in possession.—Litterae Dispensatoriae C^{lis}. Poli. Concilia M. Britanniae, iv. 112.

Catholicism in England;—a native of the country, of high rank, acceptable equally to the queen, the nobles, and the people; moderate, intelligent, and raised far above all suspicion of sordid or unworthy purposes. Affairs proceeded most prosperously, as might have been expected from such guidance. The accession of Paul IV to the papal throne was followed by the arrival of English ambassadors, who assured him of that nation's obedience.

Thus Paul had not to acquire the allegiance of England, he had merely to retain it. Let us see by what measures he sought to effect this.

First, he declared the restitution of all Church property to be an indispensable duty, the neglect of which entails everlasting damnation; he next attempted to re-establish the tax called "Peter's pence."¹ But, apart from these ill-considered measures, could he have adopted any method better calculated to prevent the return of the English to the Catholic pale than the indulgence of his rancorous hostility to Philip II, who, if a Spanish prince, was also king of England? In the battle of St. Quintin, which had such disastrous consequences for Italy, English soldiers assisted to gain the victory. Finally, he persecuted Cardinal Pole, whom he never could endure, deprived him of his dignity as legate, an office that no man had ever borne with greater advantage to the Holy See, and appointed an aged inefficient monk to succeed him, whose principal recommendation was that he shared the prejudices of the pontiff.² Had it been the purpose of Paul to impede the work of restoration, he could not have adopted more effectual measures.

There can be no wonder that the opposing tendencies should immediately act with renewed violence on the unexpected death of the queen and the cardinal. This result was powerfully accelerated by the religious persecutions, which Pole had condemned, but which his bigoted antagonists approved and promoted.

Once more the pope had an opportunity of deciding the question, whether England should be Catholic or Protestant, and this decision demanded all the more serious consideration from the fact that it must inevitably affect Scotland also. In that country likewise the religious parties were in fierce contest, and accordingly as matters should be regulated in England would assuredly be the future condition of Scotland.

¹ He was exclusively occupied with these ideas. He published his bull Rescissio Alienationum (Bullarium iv. 4, 319), in which he annulled all alienation of Church property without any exception.

² Godwin's Annales Angliæ, &c., p. 456.

How significant then was the fact, that Elizabeth shewed herself by no means decidedly Protestant in the beginning of her reign,¹ and that she caused her accession to be instantly notified to the pope. There were even negotiations in progress for her marriage with Philip II, and the world of that day believed this event very probable. One would have thought that no state of things could be more satisfactory to the pontiff.

But Paul was incapable of moderation; he returned a repulsive and contemptuous reply to the ambassador of Elizabeth: "First of all," said he, "she must submit her claims to the decision of our judgment."

We are not to believe that the pontiff was moved to this entirely by his sense of what was due to the dignity of the Apostolic See,—other motives were in action. The French desired to prevent this marriage from national jealousy, and contrived to persuade Paul, through the pious Theatines, that Elizabeth was entirely Protestant at heart, and that no good could result from such a marriage.² The Guises were particularly interested for the success of this affair. Should the claims of Elizabeth be rejected by the Holy See, the next title to the English crown would be possessed by their sister's daughter, Mary Stuart, dauphiness of France and queen of Scotland. Could her right be established, the Guises might hope to rule in her name over all the three kingdoms. And, in fact, that princess did assume the English arms. She dated her edicts with the year of her reign over England and Ireland, while preparations for war were commenced in the Scottish ports.³

¹ Nares, also, in his Memoirs of Burleigh, considers her religious principles "at first liable to some doubts."

² Private narrative of Thuanus.

³ In Forbes's Transactions there is a Responsio ad Petitiones D.

Thus, had Elizabeth not been disposed to the opinions of the Protestants, the force of circumstances would have compelled her to adopt that party. This she did with the most decided resolution, and succeeded in obtaining a parliament having a Protestant majority,¹ by which all those changes that constitute the essential character of the English church were in a few months effected.

The influence of this turn of things necessarily affected Scotland also. In that country the French-Catholic interest was resisted by a party that was at once Protestant and national; Elizabeth lost no time in allying herself with this, and was even exhorted to the measure by the Spanish ambassador himself!² The treaty of Berwick, which she concluded with the Scottish opposition, gave the predominance in Scotland to the Protestants. Before Mary Stuart could land in her own kingdom, she was compelled not only to renounce her claim to the crown of England, but even to ratify the acts of a parliament guided by Protestant influence, and one of which forbade the performance of mass under penalty of death.

To a reaction against the designs of France then, which the proceedings of the pope had favoured and promoted, was in a great measure to be attributed the triumph gained by Protestantism in Great Britain, and by which its ascendancy there was secured for ever.

There is no doubt that the inward impulses of those who held Protestant opinions had their origin in causes much more deeply seated than any connected with political movements; but for the most part the outbreak, progress, and decision of the religious struggle, very closely coincided with the various contingencies of politics.

In Germany also, a measure adopted by Paul IV was in one respect of peculiar importance; incited by his old aversion to the house of Austria, he had opposed the transfer of the imperial crown, which obliged Ferdinand I to be more Glasion. et Episc. Aquilani, by Cecil, which sets forth all these motives in the most lively manner.

¹ Neal, History of the Puritans, i. 126: "The court took such measures about elections as seldom fail of success."

² Camden, Rerum Anglicarum Annales, p. 37.

attentive than he had hitherto been to the maintenance of friendly relations with his Protestant allies; the affairs of Germany were thenceforward governed by a union of the moderate princes belonging to both confessions, and under their influence it was that the transference of ecclesiastical foundations in Lower Germany to Protestant administrations was eventually accomplished.

We are warranted in declaring that the Popedom seemed destined to suffer no injury, to which it had not itself conduced in one way or another by its tendency to interference in political affairs.

And now, if we survey the world from the heights of Rome, how enormous were the losses sustained by the Catholic faith! Scandinavia and Great Britain had wholly departed; Germany was almost entirely Protestant; Poland and Hungary were in fierce tumult of opinion; in Geneva was to be found as important a central point for the schismatics of the Latin nations and of the West, as was Wittenberg for those of Germanic race and the East, while numbers were already gathering beneath the banners of Protestantism in France and the Netherlands.

Only one hope now remained to the Catholic confession. The symptoms of dissent that had appeared in Spain and Italy had been totally suppressed, and a restorative strictness had become manifest in all ecclesiastical institutions. The administration of Paul had been doubtless most injurious from its secular policy, but it had at least achieved the introduction of a determined spirit of reform into the court and palace. The question now was, would this have force to maintain itself there; and, in that case, would it then proceed to pervade and unite the whole Catholic world.

5. PIUS IV

We are told that Alessandro Farnese, making one at a banquet of cardinals, gave a wreath to a boy who possessed the art of improvisation to the lyre, desiring him to offer it to that one among them who should one day be pope. The boy, Silvio Antoniano, afterwards a distinguished man, and himself a cardinal, went instantly to Giovanni Angelo Medici; and, first singing his praises, presented to him the wreath. This Medici was the successor of Paul, and took the name of Pius IV.¹

He was of mean birth. His father Bernardino had settled in Milan, where he had acquired a small property by government contracts.² The sons had nevertheless to do the best they could for their own support: the elder, Giangiacomo, betook himself to the trade of arms, and at first entered the service of a nobleman: the second, Giovanni Angelo, devoted himself to study, but with very slender means. The origin of their prosperity was as follows: Giangiacomo, naturally reckless and enterprising, had rendered himself useful to the rulers of Milan, by ridding them of one of the Visconti family, called Monsignorino, who was their rival; but no sooner was this murder accomplished than those who devised it were anxious to be delivered from the tool they had employed. To this end they sent the young man to the castle of Mus, on the lake of Como, with a letter to the governor containing orders for his own immediate death; but Giangiacomo felt suspicions of evil, opened the letter, saw what was prepared for him, and at once resolved on the measures to be taken. He gathered a number of trusty comrades, gained admission to the castle by means of the letter he bore, and succeeded in taking possession of it. From that time he assumed the position of an independent prince. Secure in his fortress, he kept the Milanese, Swiss, and Venetians, who were his neighbours, in perpetual activity by his ceaseless incursions. After a time, he took the white cross and entered the imperial service. He received the title of Marchese di Marignano, served as chief of artillery in the war against the Lutherans, and commanded the emperor's forces at Siena.¹ His shrewdness was not inferior to his daring; his undertakings were invariably successful, but he was altogether without pity; many a wretched peasant, who was attempting to carry provisions into Siena, did he kill with his iron staff. Scarcely was there a tree far and near on which he had not caused some one of them to be hanged. It was computed that he had put to death at least five thousand men. He took Siena, and founded a considerable house.

¹ Nicus Erythraeus relates this anecdote in the article on Antoniano, Pinacotheca, p. 37. Mazzuchelli also has it. The election took place on the 26th of Dec. 1559.

² Girolamo Soranzo, Relatione di Roma: "Bernardino, padre della B. S., fu stimato persona di somma bontà e di gran industria, ancora che fusse nato in povero e basso stato: non di meno venuto habitar a Milano si diede a pigliar datii in affitto."

The advance of his brother, Giovanni Angelo, had kept pace with his own. This last took the degree of doctor-in-law, and gained some reputation as a jurist; he then purchased an office in Rome, and rapidly acquired the confidence of Paul III. When the Marchese di Marignano, his brother, was married to an Orsini, the sister of Pier Luigi Farnese's wife,² he was himself made cardinal. After this we find him in the administration of papal cities, charged with the conduct of political negotiations, and more than once intrusted with the commissariat of papal armies. Cardinal Medici ever proved himself discreet, intelligent, and kindly disposed; but Paul IV detested him, and once burst into violent invectives against him in full consistory. Medici then thought it best to leave Rome, and resided sometimes at the baths of Pisa, sometimes in Milan, where he raised many splendid buildings, beguiling his exile by literary occupations, and by the exercise of a beneficence so magnificent as to procure him the name of "Father of the Poor." It was very probably the extreme contrast he exhibited to Paul IV that principally contributed to his election.

This contrast was indeed more than commonly striking.

Paul IV was a Neapolitan, highly born, of the

¹ Ripamonte, Historia Urbis Mediolani. Natalis Comes Hist.

² Soranzo: "Nato 1499, si dottorò 1525, vivendo in studio così strettamente che il Pasqua suo medico, che stava con lui a dozana, l'accommodò un gran tempo del suo servitore e di qualche altra cosa necessaria. Del 1527 comprò un protonotariato. Servendo il Cl. Farnese (Ripamonte mentions his good understanding with Paul III) colla più assidua diligenza, s'andò mettendo in anzi: ebbe diversi impieghi, dove acquistò nome di persona integra e giusta e di natura officiosa." The marriage of the marquis follows, with the promise of a cardinalate to himself.

anti-Austrian faction, a zealot, a monk, and an Inquisitor. Pius IV was the son of a Milanese tax-gatherer, firmly attached to the house of Austria, by his brother and some other German connections; a lawyer, a man of the world, and fond of enjoyment. Paul IV stood aloof and inaccessible, never discarding his majesty for even the least dignified occasions. Pius was all cordiality and condescension. He was seen daily in the streets on foot or on horseback, and sometimes almost without attendants; he conversed freely with all. The Venetian despatches make us perfectly acquainted with him.¹ The ambassadors find him writing or transacting business in a large cool room; he rises and walks with them up and down this hall; or he is perhaps about to visit the Belvedere; he seats himself without laying the stick from his hand, hears what they have to say, and continues his walk in their company. While treating them with this pleasant intimacy, however, he desired to meet respect and politeness in return. The clever expedients occasionally proposed to him by the Venetians, were sure to elicit his smiles and praises; but all his fidelity to the Austrian cause could not prevent him from disliking the formal imperious manners of the Spanish envoy, Vargas. Unwilling to be encumbered with details, which instantly wearied him, his attention was readily given to the really important matter, and while this was kept in view, he was always good-tempered and most easy to deal with. On such occasions he would pour forth a thousand friendly protestations; declare himself to be by nature a lover of justice, and to hate bad men with all his heart; that he would not willingly restrict the freedom of any man, would fain shew kindness and good-will towards all, but most especially was resolved to labour heartily for the good of the Church, and trusted in God that he might accomplish something useful to its interests. How easily can we bring him before us; a portly old man, still active enough to reach his country-house before sunrise. His countenance was cheerful, his eyes were bright and keen; lively conversation, the pleasures of the table, and perhaps a harmless jest—these were his recreations:

¹ Ragguagli dell' Ambasciatore Veneto da Roma, 1561. By Marco Antonio Amulio (Mula), Informatt. Pol. xxxvii.

recovering once from an illness that had been thought dangerous, he mounted his horse at the first possible moment, rode away to a house where he had dwelt in his cardinalate, and stepping firmly up and down the stairs, "No, no," he exclaimed, "we don't mean to die just yet!"

But this pontiff, so joyous, of so worldly a temperament—was he precisely the head of the Church required under the difficult circumstances of the moment? Was it not to be feared that he would depart from the course so lately entered on by his predecessor? I will not say that his character might not have led him to do this, yet in fact the event was not so.

He had certainly no love for the Inquisition in his heart. The monkish severity of its proceedings was most uncongenial to his nature; he seldom or never appeared in the congregation, but neither did he seek to lessen the power of its officers. He declared himself to understand nothing of the matter, said that he was no theologian, and permitted them to exercise all the influence they possessed under Paul IV.¹

He made a fearful example of the nephews of his predecessor. The atrocities committed by the duke of Palliano, even after his fall, among others that of murdering his wife in a fit of jealousy, facilitated the efforts of their enemies, who thirsted for revenge; a criminal process was commenced against them, and they were accused of the most detestable crimes; robberies, forgeries, and assassinations, together with the most tyrannical abuse of the powers intrusted to them, and the most systematic duplicity practised against their aged uncle, the late pontiff. Their defence is still extant, and is not altogether without an appearance of justification.² But their accusers prevailed. The pope caused all the evidence to be read before him; with this he was occupied in the consistory from early morning till late at night, when the accused were condemned, and received sentence of death. These were the cardinal and the duke of Palliano, with Count Aliffe and Leonardo di Cardine, two of their nearest connections. Montebello and some others had before taken flight. The cardinal had perhaps expected banishment, but had never thought of death. He received the announcement of his sentence in the morning before he had risen: when it was no longer possible to doubt the fact, he buried his face in the bed-clothes for a time, then raising his head he clasped his hands together, uttering those words that, while sounding like resignation, are in fact but the expression of the deepest despair from the lips of an Italian. "Bene! Pazienza"—"It is well! let us have patience!" His usual confessor was not permitted to attend him, but to the one accorded, he had, as may be imagined, much to say, and his confession continued a long time. "Make an end, Monsignore," exclaimed an officer of police, "we have other affairs to settle."

¹ Soranzo: "Se bene si conobbe, non esser di sua satisfatione il modo che tengono gl' inquisitori di procedere per l'ordinario con tanto rigore contra gl' inquisiti, e che si lascia intendere che piu li piacerea che usassero termini da cortese gentiluomo che da frate severo, non di meno non ardisce o non vuole mai oppondersi ai giudicii loro."

² Bromato gives particular details of these events, which he takes principally from Nores. In the Informatt. we also find the letters of Mula; for example, 19th July, 1560; the Extractus Processus Cardinalis Caraffae, and El successo de la muerte de los Carafas, con la declaracion

And so perished the nephews of Paul IV. They were the last who aspired to independent principalities, and excited general commotions for the furtherance of their own purposes in politics. From the times of Sixtus IV we have Girolamo Riario, Caesar Borgia, Lorenzo de' Medici, Pier Luigi Farnese, and the Caraffa, who, as we said, were the last. The kindred of popes have made themselves conspicuous in later times, but in a totally different manner. The old forms of nepotism have appeared no more.

How could Pius IV, for example, have conferred on his own family a power, for the exercise of which he had so heavily visited the Caraffa? He was, besides, disposed, by the peculiar activity of his character, to the retention of affairs in his own hands; all important business was carefully examined by himself; he weighed the evidence, and determined by his own judgment. He was considered to rely too little rather than too much on the aid of others. This ye el modo que murieron. La Morte de Cl. Caraffa (Library at Venice, vi. n. 39) is the MS. that Bromato had before him, in addition to that of Nores.

disposition was, perhaps, confirmed by the fact, that of his two nephews, the one, Federigo Borromeo, whom he might have wished to advance, died young; the other, Carlo Borromeo, was not the man for worldly aggrandizement, and would never have accepted it. This last, indeed, regarded his connection with the pontiff, and the contact into which it brought him with the most weighty affairs of the government, not as involving the right to any personal advantage or indulgence, but rather as imposing duties that demanded his most assiduous care. To these, then, he devoted himself with equal modesty and perseverance; his best energies were earnestly applied to the administration of the state; he gave audience with the most unwearied patience. It was for the more effectual performance of his duties, that he called around him that "collegium" of eight learned men, whence was afterwards formed the important institution of the "Consulta." He lent valuable aid to the pope, and is the same Borromeo who was afterwards canonized. No life could be more noble and blameless than was that of the cardinal. "In so far as we know," says Girolamo Soranzo, "he is without spot or blemish, so religious a life and so pure an example leave the most exacting nothing to demand. It is greatly to his praise, that in the bloom of youth, nephew to a pope whose favour he entirely possesses, and living in a court where every kind of pleasure invites him to its enjoyment, he yet leads so exemplary a life." His recreation was to gather round him in the evenings a few learned and distinguished men; with these he would at first discuss profane literature, but from Epictetus and the Stoics, whom Borromeo, then young, did not despise, the conversation even in these leisure moments soon turned to theological subjects.¹ If a fault could be found in him, it was not of deficiency in uprightness of purpose, or steadiness of application, but perhaps to some extent in talent. His servants indeed thought it a defect, that they could no longer count on those rich marks of favour which were conferred in former times by the papal nephews.

¹ These are the Noctes Vaticanae, mentioned by Glussianus, Vita Caroli Borromei, i, iv, 22.

And thus did the qualities of the nephew make amends for whatsoever might be thought wanting by the more severely disposed, in the character of the uncle. In any case, all things proceeded in their established course; affairs spiritual and temporal were conducted with good order and due attention to the interests of the Church, nor was the work of reform neglected. Pius admonished the bishops publicly to reside in their dioceses, and some were seen at once to kiss his foot and take their leave. Ideas that have once become widely prevalent, assume an irresistible force of coercion. The seriousness of spirit now prevailing in religious matters had gained the mastery in Rome, and the pope himself could no longer depart from its dictates.

But if the somewhat worldly dispositions of Pius IV were not permitted to impede the restoration of a strictly religious spirit, it is certain that they contributed infinitely towards the composing of that discord, and the removal of those animosities, by which the Catholic world had been so long afflicted.

It had been the full conviction of Paul IV that a pope was created for the subjugation of emperors and kings; thus it was that he plunged himself into so many wars and enmities. Pius perceived the error of this notion all the more clearly, because it was committed by his immediate predecessor, and one to whom he felt that he was in many ways directly contrasted. "Thereby did we lose England," would he say,—“England that we might have retained with perfect ease, had Cardinal Pole been supported in his measures; thus too has Scotland been torn from us; for during the wars excited by these severe proceedings, the doctrines of Germany made their way into France.” He, on the contrary, was desirous of peace above all things; even with the Protestants he would not willingly have war. An ambassador from Savoy came soliciting his aid for an attack on Geneva. He repeatedly interrupted his speech: “What sort of times are these,” said he, “for making such proposals?” He declared that nothing was so needful to him as peace.¹ Fain would he have been on good terms with all the world. He dispensed his ecclesiastical favours liberally; and when compelled to refuse any thing, always did so with gentleness and consideration. It was his conviction that the authority of the papacy could no longer subsist without the support of the temporal sovereigns, and this he did not seek to conceal.

¹ Mula, 14 Feb. 1561. Pius requested him to say, “That we desire to remain at peace; we have no idea of these fancies of the duke

In the latter part of the pontificate of Paul IV, a council was again universally demanded; and it is certain that Pius IV would have found it very difficult to resist this call. He could not urge the pretext of war, as had previously been done, since peace was at length established throughout Europe. A general council was indeed imperatively needful to his own interests, for the French were threatening to convoke a national council, which might possibly have led to a schism. But, apart from all this, my own impression is, that he honestly desired this measure. Let us hear what he says himself of the matter: "We desire this council," he declares, "we wish it earnestly, and we would have it to be universal. Were it otherwise, we could throw obstacles before the world that might hinder it for years; but we desire on the contrary to remove all hindrances. Let what requires reformation be reformed, even though it be our own person and our own affairs. If we have any other thought than to do God service, then may God visit us accordingly." He sometimes complained that the sovereigns did not duly support him in so great an undertaking. One morning the Venetian ambassador found him still in bed, disabled by gout, but deeply cogitating this momentous affair. "Our intentions are upright," he remarked to the ambassador, "but we are alone." "I could not but compassionate him," observes the Venetian, "seeing him thus in his bed, and hearing him complain that he was alone to bear so heavy a burden." The affair was nevertheless making progress. On the 18th of January, 1562, so many bishops and delegates had assembled in Trent, that the twice-interrupted council could for the third time be opened. Pius IV had the most important share in bringing this about.

of Savoy; this is no time for an undertaking against Geneva, or for the appointment of generals; write that we are determined to remain at peace."

"Without doubt," says Girolamo Soranzo, who does not usually take part with this pontiff, "his holiness has in this matter given proof of all the zeal that was to be expected from so exalted a pastor; he has neglected nothing that could forward so holy and so needful a work."

6. LATER SITTINGS OF THE COUNCIL OF TRENT

How materially had the state of the world altered since the first sittings of this council! No more had the pope now to fear lest a mighty emperor should avail himself of its powers to render himself lord paramount over the Holy See. Ferdinand I was entirely divested of influence in Italy, nor was any important error as to essential points of doctrine to be apprehended.¹ These dogmas, retaining the form they had received from the first sittings of the council, though not yet entirely developed, had become predominant throughout the greater part of the Catholic world. To reunite the Protestants with the Church was no longer a thing that could be brought into question. In Germany they had now gained a position wholly unassailable. In the north their ideas as to ecclesiastical affairs had entered even into the civil policy; a change that was in process of accomplishment in England also. When the pope declared that the present council was but a continuation of the former one, he had in fact abandoned all hope that the event would verify his assertion, although he had succeeded in silencing the dissentient voices; for how in fact was it possible that the free Protestants should acquiesce in a council which, in its earlier edicts, had condemned the most essential articles of their creed?² Thus, the influence of the council was

¹ It was thus that Ferdinand I considered the matter. Litterae ad Legatos, 12 Aug. 1562, in Le Plat, Monum. ad Hist. Conc. Tridentini, v. p. 452: "Quid enim attinet—disquirere de his dogmatibus, de quibus apud omnes non solum principes verum etiam privatos homines Catholicos nulla nunc penitus existit disceptatio?"

² The principal argument urged by the Protestants in their protest: Causae cur Electores Principes aliique Augustanae confessioni adjuncti status recusent adire concilium.—Le Plat, iv. p. 57. They remark, in limited from its commencement to the now greatly contracted circle of the Catholic nations. Its efforts must be confined to the arrangements of disputes between these last and the supreme ecclesiastical authority, to the precise determination of such tenets as were not distinctly settled; and, but this most especially was its great end, to the completion of that reform in the Church which had already commenced, and to the setting forth rules of discipline that should possess universal authority.

These duties were closely limited, yet their fulfilment was surrounded by various difficulties, and there soon arose among the assembled fathers most animated controversies and disputes.

Whether the residence of bishops in their dioceses were by divine command, or prescribed simply by human authority, was a question mooted by the Spaniards; though this might seem but an idle discussion, since all agreed on the fact that residence was imperative. The Spaniards, however, further maintained the episcopal authority to be no mere emanation from that of the pontiff, but to have its origin immediately from divine appointment. Hereby they struck at the very heart's core of the whole ecclesiastical system; for by the admission of this principle, the independence of the subordinate grades in the hierarchy, which the popes had so earnestly laboured to subdue, must necessarily have been restored.

Already the council had fallen into eager disputes on this topic, when the imperial ambassadors arrived. Most especially remarkable are the articles of their proposing. One of them is to the effect that, "The pope, following the example of Christ, should humble himself, and submit to a reform in his own person, his state, and curia. The council must reform the appointment of cardinals, as well as the conclave." "How is it possible that the cardinals should choose a good pope," inquired Ferdinand, "seeing that they are not good themselves?" For the reform that should the first proclamation, those alarming words—"Omni suspensione sublata." They recall to mind the condemnation formerly passed on their most essential doctrines, and enlarge at great length on "quae mala sub ea confirmatione lateant." satisfy him, he desired to have the resolutions proposed by the council of Constance (which had not received effect) as the basis; the plan to be prepared by deputations from the different countries. But, besides this, he demanded also the cup for the laity, the marriage of priests, the remission of the fasts for some of his subjects, the establishment of schools for the poor, the purification of the breviary, legends, and homilies; more intelligible catechisms, the use of German in church singing, and the reform of the monasteries; the last for this special reason, "that their great wealth might no longer be expended in so profligate a manner."¹ Most important proposals these, without doubt, and such as, being conceded, must have led to a thorough change in the whole system of the Church. The emperor urged the consideration of them, in repeated letters.

Finally, the cardinal of Lorraine appeared with the

¹ Pallavicini has almost entirely overlooked these requirements, xvii. 1, 6. They are not to his mind, indeed they never have been made known in their proper form. They lie before us in three extracts. The first I find in P. Sarpi, lib. vi. p. 325, and again, but in Latin, in Rinaldus and Goldast. The second is in Bartholomaeus de Martyribus, and is somewhat more extensive. The third, and most complete, is in Schelhorn. They do not strictly agree. I have followed Schelhorn.—In the earlier editions I remarked that some information on this matter from Vienna was much wanted. This has now been given us in Sickel's great collection of documents relating to the Council of Trent (1872), and in his Supplementary Essay in the "Archiv für Oesterreichische Geschichte," vol. 45. In the papers there printed from the cabinet of the Emperor Ferdinand I, we gain authentic information as to the moderate and straightforward policy of that prince, which at that time was still in harmony with German aspirations in general. The first Instruction to his ambassadors at Trent is a well-written and interesting document, the work of Vice-chancellor Seld. But what we are looking for is Ferdinand's so-called "Libel of Reformation," the result of many consultations, which nevertheless contains nothing that we have not already read in Schelhorn. Sickel has not considered it necessary to reprint the whole, but has contented himself with giving the deviations from the MS. which are of slight importance. In the Essay above mentioned he discusses its origin with scrupulous care. Hence we see that the "Libel of Reformation," like the first Instruction, may be looked upon as a manifesto of the moderate party in Germany, the party who, though still Catholic, was pressing for a reconciliation with the Protestants. The ideas of Julius Pflug were also used in it, and if I am not mistaken, its contents will be found of value even at the present day.

French prelates, and cordially supported the German propositions. He also demanded, most especially, that the cup should be conceded to the laity. He required the administration of all sacraments in the mother tongue, that the mass should be accompanied by preaching and instruction, and that the psalms might be allowed to be sung in the French language in full congregation; concessions from all of which the most desirable results were anticipated. "We are fully assured," said the king, "that the accordance of the cup to the laity will restore quiet to many troubled consciences, will recall to the Church whole provinces now severed from her communion, and be to us an effective assistance in appeasing the troubles of our kingdom."¹ But the French were, moreover, desirous again to bring forward the decrees of the council of Basle; and by these it was determined, that the authority of the pope is subordinate to that of a council.

It is true that the Spaniards would in nowise support these demands of the Germans and French; the accordance of the cup to the laity, and the marriage of priests, were altogether abhorrent in their eyes, and condemned without remission. No agreement could possibly be arrived at in the council, as regarded these points; all that could be gained was, the reference of such proposals to the pontiff, who was to decide on the expediency of granting them. There were certain matters, nevertheless, as to which all three nations concurred in opposition to the claims of the Curia. All found it insufferable that the legates alone should have the right of proposing resolutions; and not this only, but that these legates should further require the approbation of the pope for every decree, and suffer none to pass but at his good pleasure. This seemed to all an affront to the dignity of the council. "If things are to proceed thus," said Ferdinand, "there will be two councils; one at Trent, the other, which is indeed the true one, in Rome."

Had the votes been taken by nations, what extraordinary decrees might not, in this state of opinions, have emanated from this assembly!

¹ Mémoire baillé à M. le Cl. de Lorraine, quand il est parti pour aller au concile.—Le Plat, iv. 562.

But since this was not done, the three nations still remained in a minority, even when their forces were united; for the Italians were more numerous than all the rest put together, and they supported the Curia, on which they were for the most part dependent, with but little regard to the question of right or wrong. This awakened much bitterness of feeling. The French amused themselves with a story of how the Holy Spirit had come to Trent in a cloak-bag. The Italians spoke of Spanish leprosies, and French diseases, by which all the faithful were infected, one after another. The bishop of Cadiz declared, that there had been bishops of great fame, nay, excellent fathers of the Church, who had been appointed by no pope; on which the Italians burst forth in unanimous vociferations, demanded his instant expulsion, and even spoke of anathema and heresy. The "heresy" was sent them back, with interest, by the Spaniards.¹ Parties would frequently assemble in the streets, shouting each its watchword of "Spain! Spain!" "Italy! Italy!" and blood was seen to flow on the ground that had been consecrated to the establishment of peace.

Was it surprising that for ten months it was found impossible even to proceed to a session; or that the first legate should dissuade the pope from going to Trent, on the ground of the remarks that all would make, if, in spite of his presence, the council could still be conducted to no satisfactory end, but must after all be dissolved?² Yet a dissolution, nay, even a suspension, or a mere translation, which had often been thought of, would have been extremely dangerous. In Rome they dared hope for nothing but evil; a council was there considered much too violent a remedy for the grievously debilitated constitution of the Church, and all feared that ruin must ensue, both for Italy and the hierarchy. "In the beginning of the year 1563," says

¹ Pallavicini, xv. v. 5. Paleotto, Acta: "Alii praelati ingeminabant, clamantes, 'Exeat, exeat;' et alii, 'Anathema sit,' ad quos Granatensis conversus respondit, 'Anathema vos estis.'"—Mendham Memoirs of the Council of Trent, p. 251.

² Lettere del C^{lo}. di Mantua, Legato al Concilio di Trento, scritta al Papa Pio IV li. 15 Gen. 1563: "Quando si avesse da dissolversi questo concilio, per causa d'altri e non nostra, mi piacereia più che V^{ra}. Beatitudine fusse restata a Roma."

Girolamo Soranzo, "and but a few days before my departure, Cardinal Carpi, dean of the college, and a man of great foresight, assured me, that in the last illness he had suffered, his prayers had been constantly that God would grant him permission to die, and not survive to see the downfall and burial of Rome. Other distinguished cardinals equally bemoan their evil destiny, and clearly perceive that no hope of escape remains to them, unless the hand of God should be mercifully extended for their protection."¹ All the misfortunes that had ever been anticipated from a council by his predecessors, were now believed by Pius IV to hang over his own head.

The persuasion that in seasons of difficulty, and, above all, in cases of grave errors in the Church, an assembly of her principal shepherds will avail to remove all evil, is at once consoling and sublime. "Let its deliberations proceed," says Augustine, "without presumption or envy, and in Catholic peace. Having profited by wider experience, let the concealed be made obvious, and let all that was shut up be brought to the light of day." But, even in the earliest councils, this ideal was far from being realized. It demanded an uprightness of purpose, a freedom from all extraneous influences,—a purity of soul, in short, that man has not yet obtained. Still less could these now be hoped for, when the Church was involved in so many contradictory relations with the State. If, notwithstanding their imperfections, general councils had still retained the respect of nations, and were still looked to with hope, and urgently demanded, this must be attributed to the necessity existing for imposing some restraint on the papal influence; but the present state of affairs seemed confirmatory of what the pontiffs had constantly maintained: namely, that in times of great perplexity, church councils tended rather to increase than remove the evil. All Italy took part in the fears of the Curia. "This council," said the Italians, "will either be continued, or it will be dissolved. In the first case,—and more especially if the pope should die pending its duration,—the ultramontanes will arrange the conclave according to their own interests, and to the disadvantage of Italy; they will lay so many restrictions on the pontiff, that he will be little more than the mere bishop of Rome; under pretence of reforms, they will render all offices worthless, and ruin the whole Curia. On the other hand, should the council be dissolved without having produced any good effect, even the most orthodox would receive great offence, while those whose faith is wavering will stand in peril of being utterly lost."

¹ "Li Cardinali di maggior autorità deploravano con tutti a tutte l'ore la loro miseria, la quale stimano tanto maggiore che vedono e conoscono assai chiaro, non esservi rimedio alcuno se non quello che piacesse dare al S^r. Dio con la sua santissima mano." Soranzo himself adds, "Certo non si può se non temere, Ser^{mo}. Principe, che la povera Italia afflitta per altre cause habbi ancor a sentire afflittione per questo particolarmente: lo vedono e lo conoscono tutti i savj." [It must needs be feared, most serene prince, that our poor Italy, afflicted by so many causes, will have to suffer from this also, and so do all wise men see and know.]

That any essential change could be produced in the opinions of the council itself, seemed, as matters now stood, altogether impossible. The legates, guided by the pope, with the Italians who were closely bound to him, were confronted by the prelates of France, Spain, and Germany, who, on their side, were led, each by the ambassador of his sovereign. What arrangement of differences,—what middle term, could be devised? There seemed none: even in February, 1563,¹ the state of things appeared to be desperate, the most vehement contentions prevailed, each party obstinately adhering to the opinions it had adopted.

But when all these affairs were examined with more earnest attention, there appeared the possibility of an escape from the labyrinth.

The discordant opinions only met and combated at Trent; their origin and guides were in Rome, and at the courts of the respective sovereigns. If these dissensions could ever be healed, it must be by proceeding to their sources. Pius IV had declared that the papacy could no longer support itself without the aid of the temporal princes : it was now the moment to act upon the principle thus laid down. The pope had once thought of receiving the demands of the different courts himself, and granting them without the intervention of the council ; but this would have been a half-measure only. The best thing now to be done was to bring the council to a close, in concert with the other great powers : no other resource presented itself.

¹ In a letter of the Bishop of Funfkirchen even the suspension of the Council is recommended. "Praestat etenim omnium judicio consilium hoc cum aliqua spe futurae concordiae et reformationis suspendi, quam sine omni fructu atque etiam cum totius bonae spei jactura orbisque magna perturbatione claudi ac infeliciter vel certe infructuose finire." (Sickel, 427).

Pius IV determined to attempt this. The most able and statesmanlike of his cardinals, Morone, gave him effectual aid.

In the first instance, Ferdinand I must be gained,—this was of the highest importance, for not only had the French concurred with him in opinion, as before related, but he had, also, much influence with Philip of Spain, his nephew, who deferred to him on most occasions.

Morone, who had been chosen president of the council, but was quickly convinced that nothing effectual could be accomplished at Trent, proceeded to Innsbruck in April, 1563, permitting no other prelate to accompany him, for the purpose of meeting the emperor, who was in that city. He found Ferdinand highly offended and in extreme discontent, fully persuaded that no serious intentions of reform were entertained in Rome, and resolved in the first place to procure perfect freedom for the council.¹

An extraordinary exercise of address, or, as we should now say, of “diplomatic skill,” was required on the part of the legate, in order to propitiate the irritated monarch.²

The emperor was, above all, offended because his own

¹ To this place belongs also the Relatione in scr. fatta dal Comendone ai S^{ri}. Legati del Concilio sopra le cose trattate dall' imperatore, 19 Feb. 1563 : “Paie che pensino trovar modo e forma di haver più parte et autorità nel presente concilio per stabilire in esso tutte le loro petitioni giuntamente con li Francesi.” [They seem to think that they will find ways and means to have more influence and authority in this council, so as to secure all their desires conjointly with the French.]

² The most important paper I have found in regard to the council of Trent, is Morone's Report of his Legation ; it is brief but conclusive. Neither Sarpì nor even Pallavicini has noticed it. Relatione sommaria del Cl. Morone sopra la Legatione sua. Bibl. Altieri, Rome, vii. f. 3.

project of reform had been set aside, and had not even been made the subject of serious discussion; but Morone found means to persuade him that there were very sufficient reasons why the formal discussion of his plan had been deferred, but that, in fact, its more important points had not only been considered but even adopted. Next, Ferdinand complained that the council was led by Rome, the legates proceeding entirely according to the instructions received from the pontiff. To this Morone replied, and the fact was incontrovertible, that the ambassadors from all the courts received their instructions from home, and were constantly furnished by their sovereigns with new suggestions.

The cardinal had long possessed the confidence of the house of Austria, and he so contrived as to get over this delicate negotiation very happily,—he smoothed away the unfavourable impressions that Ferdinand had received, and applied himself skilfully to effecting a compromise on those points which were most eagerly contested by the prelates in council. He was resolved never to permit the essential authority of the pope to be in any wise diminished; the principal object being, as he tells us himself, “to hit upon such expedients that Ferdinand might consider himself satisfied without really compromising the power either of pope or legate.”¹

The first point in dispute was, the exclusive right of presenting resolutions, which, being vested in the legates, was maintained to be an infringement on the liberty of the council. Here Morone remarked, that the right to the initiative, if possessed by the prelates generally, would be frequently used in opposition to the interest of princes: of this fact he had no difficulty in convincing the emperor, for would not the bishops, once possessed of this privilege, be very prone to use it for the purpose of proposing resolutions inimical to the existing rights of states? Thus infinite confusion might arise from such a concession. It was needful, nevertheless, to meet the wishes of the temporal princes in some way, and the expedient adopted for this purpose is sufficiently remarkable. The cardinal promised that he would himself propose whatever the ambassadors should suggest to him from their sovereigns; or, on his failing to do so, they should then have the right of proposing for themselves. This compromise was significant of the spirit that now began to prevail in the council: the legates agreed to renounce the initiative in a case supposed, but rather in favour of the ambassadors, than in that of the fathers in council.¹ It follows, then, that to the sovereigns only was accorded a portion of that authority hitherto enjoyed exclusively by the pontiffs: to the council no benefit whatever accrued.

¹ “Fu necessario trovare temperamento tale, che paresse all’ imperatore di essere in alcuno modo soddisfatto, et insieme non si pregiudicasse all’ autorità del papa nè de’ legati, ma restasse il concilio nel suo possesso.”

The demand, that the committees wherein the decrees were prepared should be permitted to assemble according to their several nations, was the second question to be mooted. To this Morone replied that the practice had always been so; but that, since the emperor desired it, a more rigid attention should be given to this rule, which should for the future be established as invariable.

Then came the third point—reform: and here the emperor conceded that the expression "Reform of the Head," as also that old question of the Sorbonne, as to whether pope or council were superior, should be avoided; in return for which, the cardinal promised a searching reform through every department; and in the plan drawn up to this intent even the conclave was included.

These more important points once arranged, the secondary questions were soon agreed on; many demands at first made by Ferdinand were withdrawn, and his ambassadors were enjoined to maintain a good understanding with the papal legates. Having successfully accomplished his mission,

¹ Summarium eorum quae dicuntur Acta inter Caesaream Majestatem et Illustrissimum Cardinalem Moronum, in the Acts of Torellus; also, in Salig, Geschichte des tridentinischen Conciliums, iii. A. 292; where this is expressed as follows: "Maj. S. sibi reservavit, vel per medium dictorum legatorum, vel si ipsi in hoc gravarentur, per se ipsum vel per ministros suos, proponi curare." I confess that I should not have inferred such a negotiation as Morone describes, from these words, although it may be implied in them.

Morone again traversed the Alps. "When people became fully aware of the emperor's friendly dispositions," says he, "and of the concord established between his ambassadors and those of the pope, the council presently changed its aspect, and was much more easily managed."

Other circumstances contributed to this result.

The French and Spaniards had fallen into dissensions about the right of their respective ambassadors to precedence in the council: thus they no longer continued to act in concert.

Special negotiations had also been entered into with each of these powers.

A cordial understanding with the pope was most essential to Philip II, for his authority in Spain being founded in a great measure on ecclesiastical interests, it was his policy to keep these carefully in his hands. This fact was perfectly well known to the court of Rome, and the nuncio from Madrid often said that a friendly termination of the council was quite as desirable for the king of Spain as for the pope. The burdens imposed on Church property had already been brought into question by the Spanish prelates at Trent, but the sums furnished by ecclesiastical foundations formed an important portion of the public revenue, and the king, much alarmed, requested the pope to forbid these offensive discussions.¹ Could he then be desirous of procuring for his prelates the right of proposing resolutions? He was anxious, on the contrary, to restrict the privileges they already possessed. The pontiff complained of the vehement opposition he had continually to endure from the Spanish bishops, and Philip promised to adopt such means as should keep them within the limits of obedience: suffice it to say, that the pope and king became assured that their interests were absolutely identical. Other negotiations must also have taken place: the pope threw himself wholly into the arms of the king, who promised, on his part, that whatever difficulty should assail the pontiff, he, Philip, would come to his aid with the whole force of his kingdom.

The French also were in the meanwhile becoming more favourable to the pope. The Guises, whose powerful influence prevailed equally in the council at Trent, as in their government at home, had in both places adopted a policy that was decidedly and increasingly Catholic. It was wholly attributable to the compliant dispositions of Cardinal de Guise, that after ten months of delay and eight adjournments, the council did at length hold a session. In addition to this an alliance of the closest character was proposed by his eminence: he desired to form a congress of the leading Catholic sovereigns, the pope, the emperor, and the kings of France and Spain.¹ For the better discussion of this project he proceeded himself to Rome, and the pope could find no words sufficiently eloquent to praise "his Christian zeal for the service of God and the public tranquillity, not in matters touching this council only, but also in others affecting the common weal."² The proposed congress would have been exceedingly agreeable to the pope, who sent ambassadors on the subject to both emperor and king.

¹ Paolo Tiepolo: Dispaccio di Spagna, 4th Dec. 1562.

It was therefore rather at the respective courts, and by means of political negotiations, than at Trent, and by the assembled fathers, that all discords were eventually composed, and all obstacles to a peaceful close of the council removed. Cardinal Morone, to whom this was principally attributable, had besides found means to conciliate the prelates individually, bestowing on each all the deference, praise, and favour that he desired and thought his due.³ His proceedings furnish a striking example of what may be effected by an able and skilful man, even under the most difficult circumstances, when he has thoroughly mastered the position of affairs, and proposes to himself such an aim only as is compatible with that position. To him more than to any other man is the Catholic church indebted for the peaceful termination of the council.

¹ Instruttione data a Mons. Carlo Visconti, mandato da Papa Pio IV al Re catt. per le cose del concilio di Trento (ultimo Ottobre, 1563): Bibl. Barb. 3007.

² "Il beneficio universale." Lettera di Papa Pio IV 20 Ottobre, 1563.

³ "The prelates," says Morone himself, "being caressed, praised, flattered, and favoured, became more tractable." Martin Perez de Ayala, who opposed him to the last, is quite indignant at the general defection: "Todo lo havia ya vencido el cardenal de Moron con sus artes ansi al C^l. de Porena como al arzobispo de Granada como otros siete o ocho que al principio estubieron bien en las cosas del bien comun." He calls Morone "hombre doblado," and says that he himself was subjected to his flatteries. (From his autobiography in the Vida de Villanueva, ii. p. 420.)

The path was now freed from its encumbrances ; there now only remained, as he has himself remarked, to contend with those difficulties that were inseparable from the nature of the subject.

The first that presented itself was the old controversy as to the divine right of bishops, and the necessity of their residence. Long did the Spaniards remain immovably fixed in the defence of their tenets ; even so late as July 1563, they maintained them to be as infallible as the ten commandments. The archbishop of Granada desired that all books upholding contrary doctrines should be prohibited.¹ They consented, nevertheless, that these their favourite tenets should be omitted from the decree that was at length drawn up, a form being adopted that left them a pretext for defending the same at any future time. Lainez makes this ambiguity of the decree a special subject of eulogy.²

No very dissimilar course of proceeding was that adopted in regard to the next point in dispute, the initiative namely, proponentibus legatis. The pope announced that every one should be free to ask and to say whatever, by the decrees of ancient councils, it had been permitted to ask and to say, but he carefully abstained from using the word "propose."³ Thus an expedient was formed by which the Spaniards were contented, although the pope had not in fact made the slightest concession.

The difficulties arising from political considerations thus removed, the questions that had caused so much bitterness and wrangling were treated, not so much in the hope of deciding them, as with a view to evade their spirit by some dexterous compromise.

¹ Scrittura nelle Lettere e Memorie del Nuncio Visconti, ii. 174.

² "Ejus verba in utramque partem pie satis posse exponi : " Paleotto in Mendham's Memoirs of the Council of Trent, p. 262. The proposed clause : "Episcopos esse a Christo institutos" was rejected in favour of "esse hierarchiam divina ordinatione institutam, quae constat ex episcopis, presbyteris et ministris." It was in vain that some suggested "ordinatione peculiari," others "institutione." Bishop Mendoza of Salamanca attributes the favourable result to Cardinal Morone's clever management. (Villanueva, ii. p. 427.)

³ Pallavicini, xxiii. 6. 5.

The less weighty matters were very easily accommodated in this disposition of the council, and its proceedings had on no occasion made more rapid progress. The important dogmas respecting clerical ordination, the sacrament of marriage, indulgences, purgatory, the adoration of saints, and in fact all the principal measures of reform adopted by the assembly, were decided on in the last three sessions of the latter half of the year 1563. The congregations, as well on the one side as the other, were composed of different nations, the project of reform being discussed in five separate assemblies, one French, which met at the house of Cardinal de Guise, one Spanish, at that of the archbishop of Granada, and three Italian.¹

The questions were for the most part agreed upon with little difficulty; two only presented an exception, the first being the exemption of chapters, the second the plurality of benefices; and as regarded both these, private interest took a large share in the contest.

The first of these questions more particularly affected Spain, where the chapters had already lost some portion of the extraordinary immunities they had once enjoyed. These they sought eagerly to regain, while Philip was as eagerly bent on restricting them still further; holding the nomination of bishops himself, he had a personal interest in the extension of episcopal authority. But the pope took part with the chapters, because the influence he exercised over the Spanish church would have been materially diminished by the absolute subjection of chapters to the bishop. Again then these two powerful interests were brought into direct collision, and it became a question which was to command the majority. The Spanish king was exceedingly strong in the council; a delegate had been sent by the chapters to watch over their rights, but his ambassador had found means to exclude him. Philip had so extensive a Church patronage at his disposal, that all wished to keep on good terms with him; hence it resulted that opinions were not favourable to the chapters when the votes were taken orally, but the device adopted by the papal legates for escape from that dilemma also is worthy of remark. They resolved that the votes should on this occasion be given in writing. For though the voices, pronouncing in the presence of so many adherents of Philip, were restrained by consideration for him, the written opinions, being for the legates' hands only, were freed from that influence, and this contrivance did in fact recover an important majority for the papal wishes and the chapters. Thus supported, and by the intervention of Cardinal de Guise, they proceeded to further negotiation with the Spanish prelates, who contented themselves eventually with a much less important extension of their powers than they had hoped to obtain.¹

¹ The best accounts touching this matter are to be found where one would scarcely think of seeking them,—in Bainti, Vita di Palestrina, i. 199; they are from authentic letters. The Diary of Servantio, used by Mendham (p. 304), also touches the subject.

The second article, regarding plurality of benefices, was yet more important to the Curia; a reform in the institution of cardinals had been talked of from time immemorial, and many thought the degeneracy of that body the primary cause of all abuses. In their hands was accumulated a vast number of benefices, and the intention was to restrict the cardinals in that matter by the most stringent laws. It will be readily believed that on this point the Curia would be most sensitive; they dreaded the slightest innovation in such a direction, and shrank from even deliberating upon the question; very peculiar is here also the expedient contrived by Morone for evading the subject so feared. He mingled the reform of the cardinals with the articles respecting the bishops. "Few perceived the importance of this proceeding," as he remarks himself, "and so the rocks and shoals were all avoided."

¹ Sarpi, viii. 816, is not very distinct on this subject. The authentic explanation of Morone is extremely valuable. "L'articolo delle cause c dell' essenzioni de canonici fu vinto secondo la domanda degli ultramontani: poi facendosi contra l'uso che li padri tutti dessero voti in iscritto, furono mutate molte sententie e fu vinto il contrario. Si venne al fin alla concordia che si vede nei decreti, e fu mezzano Lorena, che gia era tornato da Roma, tutto additto al servizio di S. Beatitudine et alla fine del concilio." [The affair of the canons and their exemptions was at first carried in favour of the ultramontane party, but the votes being afterwards taken in writing, which was not customary, opinions changed, and the contrary prevailed; at length the decrees were issued as they exist, by means of Lorraine, who had returned from Rome, full of devotion to his holiness and to the purposes of the council.]

Pius IV, having thus successfully accomplished the preservation of the Roman court in the form it had hitherto maintained, did not evince any great rigour as regarded the proposed reformation of the temporal sovereigns; he permitted this subject to drop, in compliance with the suggestions of Ferdinand.¹

The proceedings were in fact such as those of a mere friendly conference might have been, while questions of subordinate interest were left to be formed into general decrees by the divines; the more important affairs were discussed by the courts. Couriers were incessantly flying in all directions, and one concession was requited by another.

And now the most earnest desire of the pope was to bring the convocation to an early close. For some time the Spaniards were unwilling to accede to this; they were not satisfied with the reforms that had been effected, and the envoy of Philip even made a demonstration of protesting; but the pope declared his readiness to call a new synod in case of need,² and all perceived the great inconvenience that would be caused by protracting the proceedings till a vacancy of the papal throne might occur while the council was still sitting; and as besides every one felt tired and longed to return home, even the Spaniards at length resigned their objection.

The spirit of opposition was essentially overcome. Even to the last, the council evinced an extreme subserviency. It even condescended to solicit from the pope a confirmation of its edicts, and expressly declared that all canons of reform, whatever might be implied in their words, were prepared with the perfect understanding that no portion of them should be construed to affect the dignity of the holy see.¹ How far was the council of Trent from renewing the demands of Constance or Basle to superiority over the papal power! In the proclamations by which the sittings were closed, and which were prepared by Cardinal de Guise, the universal episcopacy of the pope was distinctly recognised.

¹ That a searching reform of the curia, the cardinals, and the conclave did not take place, is in close connection with the omission of that intended for the sovereigns. Extracts from the correspondence of the legates, in Pallavicini, xxiii. 7, 4.

² Pallavicini, xxiv. 8, 5.

Thus prosperous was the conclusion of the council which, so eagerly demanded, so long evaded, twice dissolved, agitated by so many political tempests, and even in its third assembly assailed by dangers so imminent, now closed amidst the universal accord of the Catholic world. It will be readily comprehended that the prelates, as they came together for the last time on the 4th of December, 1563, should feel themselves affected by emotions of gladness. Former antagonists were now seen offering mutual gratulation, and tears were observed in the eyes of many among those aged men.

But seeing, as we have shewn, that this happy result had been secured only by the utmost pliancy, the most astute contrivance, the most dexterous policy, may we not enquire if the efficiency of the council had not been impaired thereby?

The council of Trent, if not more important than all other general assemblies of the Church, is indubitably more so than any that have been called in later times.

Its importance is comprised in two momentous periods:—

The first, to which we have already alluded, was during the war of Schmalkalden, when the tenets of Rome, after many fluctuations, became separated for ever from the Protestant opinions. From the doctrine of justification as then set forth, arose the whole system of dogmatic theology, as it is professed even to the present day by the Catholic church.

In the second, which we have been just considering, and after the conferences of Cardinal Morone with Ferdinand in the summer and autumn of 1563, the hierarchy was established anew, theoretically by the decrees respecting clerical ordination, and practically by the resolutions touching measures of reform.

¹ Sessio xxv. c. xxi.

These reforms were most important at the moment, nor have they yet lost their efficacy.

For the faithful were again subjected to the uncompromising severity of Church discipline, and even in extreme cases, to the sword of excommunication. Seminaries were established, wherein the youths preparing for the Church were carefully trained in habits of austerity and the fear of God. Parishes were regulated anew, preaching and the administration of the sacraments were subjected to fixed ordinances, and the co-operation of the conventual clergy was regulated by determined laws. The most rigid performance of their duties was enjoined on the bishops, more especially that involving the supervision of the clergy, according to their different degrees in the hierarchy. It was besides of the most essential efficacy that these prelates had solemnly bound themselves, by a particular "confession of faith," subscribed and sworn to by each, in a compact of obedience to the ordinances of Trent, and of absolute subjection to the pope.

And this was the result of the council by which it had unquestionably been contemplated to restrict the authority of the pontiff. An object far from being obtained, that authority having in effect received extent and confirmation from the acts of the assembly. Reserving to himself the exclusive right of interpreting the decrees of Trent, the pope held the power of prescribing the rule of faith and life. Discipline was restored, but all the faculties of directing it were centred in Rome.

But the close circumscription of her limits was now also perceived and acknowledged by the Catholic church. On the East and the Greek confession she now resigned all claim; while she drove Protestantism from her borders with anathemas innumerable. In the bosom of the earlier Catholicism, a certain element of the Protestant creed was included; this was now cast forth for ever; but if the Catholic profession had received limitations, it had also concentrated its forces, and braced all its energies well together.

Results so effectual were achieved by the concurrence and aid of the great Catholic sovereigns only, and it is in this alliance of the Church with monarchies, that one of the primary conditions to her subsequent development will be found. This is in some degree analogous with the tendency of Protestantism to combine the episcopal and sovereign rights. It was only by degrees that this displayed itself among Catholics. There is manifestly involved in it a possibility of new divisions, but of such a result there was then no immediate apprehension. The decrees of the council were readily admitted in one province after another.

The claims of Pius IV to an important place in the history of the world rest on his share in this event. He was the first pope by whom the tendency of the hierarchy to oppose itself to the temporal sovereigns was deliberately and purposely abandoned.

Having secured this important result, Pius now believed that the labours of his life were brought to a close. On the dispersion of the council it is remarked, that the tension of his mind was relaxed. It was thought that he became negligent of religious services, and devoted himself too earnestly to the pleasures of the table. He increased the splendour of his court, gave rich entertainments, and erected magnificent buildings. The more zealously disposed perceived a difference between himself and his predecessor, of which they loudly complained.¹

Not that any reaction of the general feeling was likely to ensue; a tendency had displayed itself in Catholicism that was no longer to be repressed or turned aside.

¹ Paolo Tiepolo: "Doppo che questo (il concilio) hebbe fine, liberato da una grande sollecitudine fattosi fermo e gagliardo nell' autorità sua, incominciò più liberamente ad operare conforme alla sua inclinazione e pensieri: onde facilmente si conobbe in lui animo più tosto da principe, che attendesse solamente al fatto suo, che di pontefice che avesse rispetto al beneficio e salute degli altri." [After the council was at an end, freed from great anxiety, and rendered bold in his confirmed authority, he began to act more freely according to his inclinations, so that one clearly saw in him the mind of a prince assured of his own affairs, rather than that of a pontiff regardful of the welfare of others.] Panvinius makes the same remark.

When once the spirit is fully aroused, there is no presuming to prescribe the path it shall pursue; a very trifling violation of its dictates on the part of those who should represent it in its utmost force, is productive of the most extraordinary symptoms.

It was thus that the spirit of rigid Catholicism, which had gained possession of the age, became instantly perilous to the existence of Pius IV.

There lived in Rome a certain Benedetto Accolti, catholic to enthusiasm, who was constantly speaking of a mystery entrusted to him by God himself, and which he was to make known. In proof that he was declaring the truth only, he offered to walk unhurt in presence of the assembled people, through a burning pile that was to be prepared on the Piazza Navona.

His mystery was this:—he believed himself to have received a revelation, to the effect that the Greek and Roman churches were about to be united, and that this combined Catholic church would then subdue the Turks and all heretics; that the pontiff would be a holy man, would attain universal monarchy, and restore truth and justice to the human race. By these ideas he was possessed to fanaticism. He was now convinced, however, that Pius IV, whose worldly living and being were infinitely remote from his ideal of holiness, was not formed to carry out this divine mission, and that he, Benedetto Accolti, was selected by God to deliver Christendom from so unsuitable a chief.

He conceived the design of putting the pope to death, and found an associate whom he made his own by the promise of rewards from God himself, as well as from their future holy sovereign. One day they set forward on their purpose, and soon perceived the pontiff approaching. He was in the midst of a procession, within reach of their hands—tranquil, free from suspicion, and without defence.

But instead of rushing on the sovereign, Accolti began to tremble and changed colour. The pomp and ceremony surrounding the person of a pope has something too imposing to fail of impressing so fanatical a Catholic as was this man. The pope passed on his way.

Accolti had, however, been meanwhile remarked by others. The companion whom he had gained over, Antonio Canossa, was not a person of firm resolution,—at one moment he would suffer himself to be persuaded into a second attempt, at the next he felt tempted himself to denounce their intended crime. Neither of them preserved a perfect silence, and they were at length arrested and condemned to death.¹

This will serve to show what feelings were astir in those agitated times. Pius IV had done much for the reconstruction of the Church; yet were there many to whom all seemed insufficient, and whose views went much further than anything that had yet been accomplished. Pius died on the 9th of December, 1565.

7. PIUS V

The partizans of a more rigid system in the Church had now secured a great and almost unhopèd-for advantage: a pope was elected whom they might safely consider one of themselves; this was Pius V.

I will not repeat the more or less credible stories of his election related by the book on the conclaves, and by some of the histories of his time. We have a letter from Carlo Borromeo, which sufficiently informs us on this point: "I was determined," says he, (and the large share he had in the election is well known,) "to consider nothing so much as religion and purity of faith. I was well acquainted with the piety, irreproachable life, and devout spirit of the cardinal of Alessandria, afterwards Pius V; I thought none could more fitly administer the Christian commonwealth, and used my best efforts in his favour."² In a man of so entirely spiritual a character as that possessed by Carlo Borromeo, no other motives could be expected. Philip of Spain, who had been won over to the interest of the same cardinal by his ambassador, sent his express thanks to Borromeo for having promoted the election.¹ Pius V was precisely the man then believed to be required. The adherents of Paul IV, who had kept themselves retired during the last pontificate, considered themselves most fortunate: "To Rome, to Rome!" writes one of them to another, "come confidently and at once, but with all modesty; God has raised up for us another Paul IV!"

¹ I take these facts, which I have not found elsewhere, from a MS. in the Corsini library in Rome, No. 674, with the title of, Antonio Canossa: Questo è il sommario della mia depositione per la qual causa io moro, quale si degnerà V. S. mandare alli miei S^{ri}. padre e madre.

² Clis. Borromeus, Henrico Cli. Infanti Portugalliae, Romae, d. 26 Feb. 1566. Glussiani Vita C. Borromei, p. 62. Compare with Ripamonti, Historia Urbis Mediolani, lib. xii. p. 814.

Michele Ghislieri, now Pius V, was of humble extraction; he was born at Bosco, near Alessandria, in 1504, and entered a convent of Dominicans at the age of fourteen. Here he resigned himself, body and spirit, to the devotion and monastic poverty enjoined by his order. Of the alms he gathered, he did not retain so much for himself as would have bought him a cloak for the winter, and against the heats of summer he thought severity of abstinence the best preservative. Though confessor to the governor of Milan, he always travelled on foot with his wallet on his back. When he taught, his instructions were given with zeal and precision: when, as prior, it was his office to administer the affairs of a monastery, he did this with the utmost rigour and frugality—more than one house was freed from debt by his government. The formation of his character was effected during those years when the strife between Protestant innovation and the ancient doctrines had extended into Italy: he took earnest part with those who upheld the established creed in its most rigid acceptance, and of strictly disputed points maintained by him in Parma during the year 1543, the greater part related to the papal authority, and were opposed to the new opinions. He was early invested with the office of Inquisitor, and was called on to perform his duties in places of peculiar danger, as were Como and Bergamo for example.¹ In these cities an intercourse with Germans and Swiss was not to be avoided: he was also appointed to the Valtelline, which, as belonging to the Grisons, was in like manner infested by heretics. In this employment he displayed the obstinacy and the courage of a zealot. On entering the city of Como, he was sometimes received with volleys of stones; to save his life he was frequently compelled to steal away like an outlaw, and conceal himself by night in the huts of the peasantry: but he suffered no personal danger to deter him from his purposes. On one occasion the Conte della Trinita threatened to have him thrown into a well. "As to that, it shall be as God pleases," was the Dominican's reply. Thus did he take eager part in the contest of intellectual and political powers then existing in Italy; and as the side he had chosen was victorious, he, too, advanced in importance. Being appointed commissary of the Inquisition in Rome, he was soon remarked by Paul IV, who declared Fra Michele an eminent servant of God, and worthy of higher honours. He promoted him to the bishopric of Nepi, and, by way of placing "a chain round his foot," as Michele himself tells us, "that he might not again creep back to the repose of his cloister,"² in 1557 he nominated him cardinal. In this new dignity Ghislieri continued, as ever, poor, austere, and

¹ I find this in a despatch of Soranzo, ambassador in Spain. "Non essendo conosciute le qualità di S. S.^a da questo Ser^{mo} re, mentre era in cardinalato, il detto commendator (Luigi Requesens Comm. maggior) sempre lo laudò molto, predicando questo soggetto esser degno del pontificato, con il che S. M. si mosse a dargli ordine che con ogni suo potere li desse favore." Thus the story related by Oltrocchi, in his remarks on Giussano, falls to the ground. The election took place on the 8th of January, 1566.

¹ Paolo Tiepolo, Relazione di Roma in Tempo di Pio IV et V: "In Bergamo li fu levato per forza dalle prigioni del monastero di San Domenico, dove allora si solevano mettere i rei, un principale heretico, nominato Giorgio Mondaga [another name to add to the list of Italian protestants], con gran pericolo suo e de' fiati. Nella medesima città poi travagliò assai per formare il processo contra il vescovo allora di Bergamo." [In Bergamo was taken from him by force a certain principal heretic, Giorgio Mondaga, whom he had thrown into the prisons of the convent of San Domenico, then used for criminals, and whom he and his monks strove to keep to their own great peril. In the same city he afterwards laboured to institute a process against the bishop of Bergamo.]

² Catena, Vita di Pio V, whence we draw most of our information, has this also. It was related by Pius himself to the Venetian ambassadors, Mich. Suriano and Paolo Tiepolo, as they tell us (Oct. 2, 1568). - unpretending. He told his household that they must fancy themselves living in a monastery: for himself, his sole interest was still centred in devotional exercises and the business of the Inquisition.

In a man of this character, Philip of Spain, Cardinal Borromeo, and all the more rigid party, believed they had found the salvation of the Church. The people of Rome were not so perfectly satisfied. Pius was told this, and he remarked in reply, "All the more shall they lament for me when I am dead."

He maintained all the monastic severity of his life even when pope: his fasts were kept with the same rigour and punctuality; he permitted himself no garment of finer texture¹ than his wont,—heard mass every day and frequently said it himself. Yet was he careful that his private devotions should offer no impediment to his public duties, and, though rising with the first light of day, he would not indulge himself with the customary siesta. Could any doubt exist as to the reality of his religious feelings, we may consider this proved by what he has himself declared of the papacy: it was not conducive to his advance in piety, as he complains, and the progress of his soul towards salvation and the joys of paradise was impeded by its duties, to his infinite lamentation. But for the support of prayer, he believed the weight of that burden would be more than he could endure. He enjoyed the happiness of a fervent devotion to his last hour,—it was the only kind of happiness of which he was capable, but he found it perfect. The warmth of his devotion often brought tears to his eyes, and he constantly arose from his knees with the persuasion that his prayers had been heard. When the people beheld him in the processions, barefoot, and with uncovered head, his face beaming with unaffected piety, and his long white beard sweeping his breast, they were excited to enthusiastic reverence; they believed so pious a pope had never before existed, and stories were current among them of his having converted Protestants by the mere aspect of his countenance. Pius was, moreover, kindly and affable; his manner towards his old servants was extremely cordial. How admirable, too, was the remark with which he received that Conte della Trinita, who, after having threatened to drown him, was now sent ambassador to his court. "See, now," he exclaimed, when he recognised his old enemy, "thus it is that God helps the innocent:" in no other way did he show the count that the past was remembered. He had always been exceedingly charitable, and now kept a list of the poor in Rome, whom he regularly assisted in accordance with their station.

¹ Catena, Tiepolo: "Nè mai ha lasciato la camisia di rassa, che come frate incominciò di portare. Fa le orationi divotisimamente et alcune volte colle lacrime."

Humble, resigned, and child-like are men of this character, in their ordinary state; but when irritated or wounded, they kindle into violent anger, and their resentment is implacable. An adherence to their own modes of thought and proceeding appears to them the most imperative duty, and they are exasperated by its neglect. Pius V felt an immovable conviction, that the path he had chosen was the only right one; its having conducted him to the papal throne gave him so complete a self-reliance, that doubt or fear as to the consequences of his own actions was a pain unknown to his experience.

It follows, that his adhesion to his own opinions was most obstinate; the most cogent reasons availed nothing towards making him retract or alter them. Easily provoked by contradiction, he would redden deeply on being opposed, and break forth into expressions of the utmost violence.¹ But slightly acquainted with the affairs of the world, or with politics, and suffering his judgment to be warped by accidental and secondary circumstances, it was extremely difficult to bring matters of business well through with him.

¹ Informatione di Pio V. (Bibl. Ambrosiana at Milan, F. D. 181): "La S^a S. naturalmente è gioviale e piacevole, se ben per accidente pare di altra disposizione, e di qui viene che volentieri onestamente ragiona con M^r Cirillo suo maestro di casa, il quale con le sue piacevolezze essendo huomo destro et accorto diletta S. Beatitudine e sempre profitta a se stesso et altri." [His holiness is naturally cheerful and kindly, (though sometimes accidentally seeming otherwise,) so that he readily enters into pleasant talk with Cirillo, his steward, and he, being a prudent as well as polished man, delights his holiness, while he gains advantages both for himself and others.]

It is true that he did not permit himself to act on his first impressions, as regarded individuals, and those with whom he came into contact ; but having once made up his mind about any man, whether for good or evil, nothing could afterwards shake his opinion.¹ He was, nevertheless, more disposed to think that people deteriorated, than that they became better, and there were few whom he did not regard with suspicion.

Never would he mitigate a penal sentence ; this was constantly remarked of him ; rather would he express the wish that the punishment had been more severe !

He was not satisfied to see the Inquisition visiting offences of recent date, but caused it to inquire into such as were of ten or twenty years' standing.

If there were any town wherein few punishments were inflicted, he did not believe the place any the better for that, but ascribed the fact to the negligence of the officials.

The severity with which he insisted on the maintenance of Church discipline is entirely characteristic. " We forbid," says he, in one of his bulls, " that any physician, attending a patient confined to his bed, should visit him longer than three days, without receiving a certificate that the sick person has confessed his sins anew."² A second bull sets forth the punishments for violation of the Sabbath, and for blasphemy. These were fines for the rich ; but, " for the common man, who cannot pay, he shall stand before the church-door, for one whole day, with his hands tied behind his back, for the first offence ; for the second, he shall be whipped through the city ; for the third, his tongue shall be bored through, and he shall be sent to the galleys."

This was the general spirit of his ordinances. How frequently did it become necessary to remind him, that he had to govern mere men, and not angels !³

¹ Informatione di Pio V : " E piu difficultoso di lasciar la cattiva impressione che la buona, e massimamente di quelle persone che non ha in pratica."

² Supra gregem dominicum : Bull. iv. ii. p. 218.

³ In the Informationi Politiche xii., for example, is found an epistle from a certain Bertano to the holy father, expatiating largely on this subject, and exhorting him to endure the Jews and courtesans. The Caporioni entreated the pope at least to tolerate these last ; but Pius

To defer to the secular powers was now acknowledged to be most needful; but no consideration of this kind was permitted to affect the severities of Pius V. The princes of Europe had constantly complained of the bull, "In Coenâ Domini." This he not only proclaimed anew, but even rendered it more onerous, by adding special clauses of his own, wherein there was a disposition shewn to refuse the temporal sovereign all right of imposing new taxes.

It will be manifest, that proceedings so violent were calculated to produce reactions, and so it happened; not merely because the demands made by a man of so rigid an austerity never can be complied with by the generality of mankind, but also because, in this case, a deliberate resistance was provoked, and various misunderstandings arose. Even Philip of Spain, though usually so devout, was once moved to warn the pontiff, that he would do well to avoid the trial of what a prince was capable of doing when driven to the last extremity.

Pius V, on his part, felt this very deeply. He was sometimes most unhappy in his high station, and declared himself "weary of living." He complained, that since he acted without respect to persons he had made enemies, and that he had never been free from vexations and persecutions since he had ascended the papal throne.

But, however this may have been, and though Pius V could no more give satisfaction to the whole world than other men, it is yet certain that his demeanour and habits did exercise incalculable influence over his contemporaries, and the general development of his Church. After so long a train of circumstances,—all concurring to call forth and promote a more spiritual tendency,—after so many resolutions had been adopted, to make this tendency universally dominant, there needed a pope of this character, in order to secure that it should not only be widely proclaimed, but also practically enforced. To this effect, the zeal and example of Pius V were alike efficacious.

The reformation of the court, so often promised, was at replied that, rather than wink at such things, he would leave Rome himself.

length commenced in fact and reality, if not in the forms at first proposed. The expenditure of the papal household was greatly reduced. Pius V required little for his own wants, and was accustomed to say, that "he who would govern others must begin by ruling himself." For such of his servants as he believed to have served him truly throughout his life, not from hope of reward, but from affection, he provided well; but his dependants generally were held within closer limits than had ever been known under any other pope. He made his nephew, Bonelli, cardinal, but only because he was told that this was expedient in order to maintain a more confidential intercourse with the temporal princes. He would, however, confer on him only a very moderate endowment; and when the new cardinal once invited his father to Rome, Pius commanded that he should quit the city again, not that same night only, but that very hour. The rest of his relations he would never raise above the middle station; and if one among them was detected in any offence, even a falsehood, he would never forgive him, but drove him without mercy from his presence. How different was all this from that nepotism which had, for centuries, formed so significant a fact in the papal histories! In one of his most severely energetic bulls, Pius V forbade any future alienation of Church property, under whatever title, or with whatever pretext; he even declared every one to be excommunicated who should even counsel such an act, and made all the cardinals subscribe this edict.¹ He proceeded zealously to the removal of all abuses. Few dispensations were granted by him, still fewer compositions; even such indulgences as had been issued by his predecessors were partially recalled. His auditor-general was commanded to proceed against all bishops and archbishops who should neglect to reside in their dioceses, and to report them to himself, in order that he might depose the refractory.² He enjoined all parish priests, under heavy penalties, to remain in their parishes, and to see that divine service was duly performed, recalling whatever dispensations had been granted to them in this respect.¹ Not less earnest were his labours for the restoration of conventual order and discipline. To all monasteries he confirmed, on the one hand, their exemption from taxes and other burdens, as, for example, that of quartering troops; he would not permit their tranquillity to be disturbed: but, on the other hand, he forbade monks to receive confessions without examination by, and permission from, the bishops: this examination might be repeated by every new bishop.² He commanded both monks and nuns to remain in the strictest seclusion. This was not universally commended. The Orders complained that he enforced on them rules of more stringent severity than those to which they had bound themselves. Some fell into a sort of desperation; others fled their cloisters.³

¹ Prohibitio alienandi et infeudandi civitates et loca S. R. E. ; Admonet nos ; 1567, 29 Mart.

² Cum alias, 1566, 10 Junii, Bull, iv. ii. 303.

These regulations were first enforced in Rome; but afterwards, throughout the States of the Church. He bound the secular as well as the ecclesiastical authorities to the observance of his religious ordinances,⁴ while he himself provided for a rigorous and impartial administration of justice.⁵ Not content with earnestly enforcing on all magistrates a strict attention to their duties, he held himself a public sitting with the cardinals, on the last Wednesday in

¹ Cupientes, 1568, 8 Julii. Bull. iv. iii. 24.

² Romani, 1571, 6 Aug. Bull. iv. iii. 177.

³ Tiepolo: "Spese volte nel dar rimedio a qualche disordine incorre in un altro maggiore, procedendo massimamente per via degli estremi." [Always proceeding in extremes, he sometimes fell into a greater evil, while seeking to avoid a smaller one.]

⁴ Bull. iv. iii. 284.

⁵ Informazione della qualità di Pio V, e delle cose che da quelle dependono (Berlin Library): "Nel conferire le gratie non si cura delle circostanze, secondo che alle volte sarebbe necessario per qualsivoglia rispetto considerabile, nè a requisition d'alcuno la giustitia si ha punto alterata, ancora che sia senza dar scandalo e con esempio d'altri pontefici potesse fare." [He confers favours without that respect of persons, which might sometimes be necessary for weighty causes; nor will he change one tittle in affairs of justice, even though other popes have set the example, and it may be done without causing scandal.] Suriano says that he granted no favour without an admonition, "il che mi parse proprio il stilo de' confessori, che fanno una gran riprensione al penitente, quando sono per assolverlo" [which appears to me precisely the fashion of a confessor, who reproves the penitent severely when about to bestow absolution.]

every month, when any person, who might consider himself aggrieved by the ordinary tribunals, was at liberty to make his plaint to the sovereign in person. Besides all this, he gave audience with the most indefatigable assiduity. He remained seated for this purpose, from the first hours of morning, nor was any one refused admission to his presence. The consequence of all these efforts was, in fact, an entire reform of external life in Rome. We have a remark of Paolo Tiepolo to this effect. "In Rome," says he, "matters proceed in a fashion very unlike what we have hitherto seen. Men here have become a great deal better—or at least they have put on the appearance of being so."

Something similar was, more or less, to be seen over all Italy. Church discipline had been rendered more strict, in most places, by the promulgation of the decrees of the council; and the pontiff received a readiness of obedience such as none of his predecessors had enjoyed for a long period.

Duke Cosimo of Florence gave up to him, without hesitation, all who had been condemned by the Inquisition. Carnesecchi, another of the men of letters who had participated in those early movements towards Protestantism, which we have described as made in Italy, had hitherto remained uninjured. But neither his personal credit, the position of his family, nor his connection with the reigning house itself, could longer save him. He was given up bound to the Roman Inquisition, and suffered death at the stake.¹ Cosimo was entirely devoted to the pope; he assisted him in all his enterprises, and did not hesitate to admit all his spiritual claims. Pius was moved by this to crown him grand duke of Tuscany. The right of the papal see to take such a step was very doubtful, and the immoral character of Cosimo caused it to be seen with just resentment; but his devotion to the Holy See, and the severity of ecclesiastical regulation that he enforced throughout his dominions, were merits that stood above all others in the eyes of the pope.

The ancient rivals of the Medici, the Farnesi, now emulated their proceedings in this particular; even Ottavio Farnese made it his glory to shew that every papal command found unquestioning obedience at his hands.

¹ 1567. Cantini: Vita di Cosimo, p. 458.

Not altogether so friendly were the terms on which the pope stood with the Venetians. They were not sufficiently virulent against the Turks, they were less favourable towards monastic bodies, and, above all, less cordial to the Inquisition than Pius would have had them be. He nevertheless took great pains to avoid a rupture with them. "The republic" he declared to be "firmly seated in the faith—she had ever maintained herself most Catholic—she alone had been exempt from the incursions of barbarians, the honour of Italy reposed on her head;" and he declared that "he loved her." The Venetians, too, conceded more to him than they had ever done to any other pontiff. The unhappy Guido Zanetti of Fano, whose religious opinions had become suspected, and who had fled to Padua, they resigned into his hands, a thing never before recorded in their annals. The clergy of their city had previously troubled themselves but little with strict ecclesiastical discipline—they were now brought into very tolerable order. The churches of Verona, being placed under the guidance of Matteo Giberto, became models of discipline. Gilberto was held up as affording an example of what the life of a true bishop should be;¹ his plans and regulations have been accepted as exemplars by the whole Catholic world, and many of them were adopted by the council of Trent. Carlo Borromeo caused his portrait to be taken, and had it hung in his cabinet, that he might have constantly before his eyes the face of him whose life and conduct he so greatly venerated.

Still more effectual was the influence exercised by Carlo Borromeo himself. From his numerous dignities and offices, that of grand penitentiary among others, and as chief of the cardinals nominated by his uncle, he might have held the most brilliant position in Rome; but he resigned these advantages, and refused all, to devote himself to his duties as archbishop of Milan. These he performed, not with energy and conscience only, but with a sort of passion. He was incessantly occupied in the pastoral visitation of his diocese, which he traversed in every direction; there was no village, however remote, that he had not visited two or three times; the highest mountains, the most secluded valleys, all were alike known and cared for. He was usually preceded by a "Visitator," whose report he then took with him, examining and verifying all with his own eyes; all punishments were adjudged by himself, all improvements proceeded under his own directions.¹ His clergy were instructed to pursue similar methods. Six provincial councils were held under his presidency. In addition to all this he performed the usual clerical functions with indefatigable zeal. He preached and said mass, passed whole days in administering the Communion, ordaining priests, presiding at the profession of nuns, and consecrating altars. The consecration of an altar was a ceremony of eight hours' duration, and he is said to have consecrated three hundred. It is true that many of his arrangements relate to matters merely external, such as the restoration of buildings, harmonizing of the ritual, exposition and adoration of the Host, &c. The most efficient result of his labours was perhaps the severity of discipline in which he held his clergy, and which they, in their turn, enforced on the people.

¹ Petri Francisci Zini, boni pastoris, exemplum ac specimen singulare ex Jo. Matthæo Giberto episcopo expressum atque propositum. Written in 1536, and originally intended for England.—Opera Giberti, p. 252.

Nor was he unacquainted with the best modes of procuring obedience for his ordinances. In the Swiss districts of his diocese it was his custom to visit all places of ancient and venerated sanctity; to the people he would distribute gifts; those of better station were invited to his table. He was prepared, on the other hand, with measures suitable to the refractory; passing on a certain occasion through the Val Camonica, the peasantry stationed themselves along the road to receive his blessing; but they had not for a long time paid their tithes, and the archbishop passed along without moving a hand or turning his eyes on one of them; the people, shocked and terrified by this privation, were glad to return to their accustomed duty.² He nevertheless did sometimes meet with a more obstinate and rancorous opposition.

¹ Glussianus, De Vita et Rebus gestis S. Caroli Borromaei Mediol., p. 112, is very explicit in regard to the "ritus visitationis," and all such matters.

² Ripamonte, Historia Urbis Mediolani, in Graevius, ii. i. p. 864. Ripamonte has also dedicated all the second part of his history, lib. xi.-xvii., to St. Charles Borromeus.

He had resolved to reform the order of Umiliati, whose members had entered it only to expend the great wealth of the order in a life of licentiousness.¹ These men were so exasperated by his purpose of reforming them, that they made an attempt to destroy him ; a shot was fired at him when he was praying in his chapel. But no event of his life was more useful to his influence than this attack ; the people considered his escape a miracle, and from that time it was that they first began to regard him with veneration.

This feeling increased from day to day, as constant proofs of his excellence were seen. His zeal was as pure and unsullied by worldly motive as it was warm and persistent. When the plague raged in Milan, in that hour of utmost peril, his solicitude for the temporal and eternal welfare of those committed to his care was incessant, and his conduct marked an utter disregard for his own life ; no one act of this excellent archbishop but proved his piety, and under his governance the city of Milan assumed a new aspect. "How shall I find words sufficient to praise thee, most beautiful city !" exclaims Gabriel Paleotto towards the close of the archbishop's administration ; "thy sanctity and religion excite my veneration ; in thee I behold a second Jerusalem !" However we may suppose the Milanese nobility led by policy to praise their spiritual chief, we cannot believe exclamations so enthusiastic to have been without cause. The duke of Savoy also offered a solemn congratulation to Borromeo on the success of his exertions. It was now the care of the latter to secure the future stability of his regulations ; to this end a congregation was established, whose office it was to maintain the uniformity of the ritual. A particular order of regular clergy, called Oblati, devoted themselves wholly to the service of the archbishop and his church, the Barnabites received new rules, and from that time their labours have been consecrated to assisting the bishops in the cure of souls ; first in that diocese, and afterwards wherever their order made a home.¹ These regulations were a repetition of those established in Rome, but on a smaller scale. A Collegium Helveticum was also founded in Milan, intended to promote the restoration of Catholicism in Switzerland, as the Collegium Germanicum of Rome was erected in that city for the same purpose as regarded Germany. All this could only corroborate and confirm the dignity and consideration of the pope, since Borromeo, who never received a papal brief but with uncovered head, would infallibly communicate his own reverential devotedness to his church.

¹ They had altogether ninety-four houses, of which each could accommodate a hundred men ; but the brethren were so few, that two would occupy a whole house ; the order was suppressed, and their riches were divided between the endowments of Borromeo and the society of Jesuits.

Pius V had meanwhile acquired an unusual degree of influence in Naples also ; in the earliest days of his pontificate he had summoned to his presence Tomaso Orsino^{da} Foligno, whom he had sent on a visitation of reform to the Roman churches. The mission being accomplished, he had nominated Orsino to the bishopric of Strongoli, and despatched him with the same view to Naples. Amidst a great concourse of that devout people the new bishop completed his visitation in the capital, and afterwards proceeded through a great part of the kingdom.

It is true that the pope had, not unfrequently, disputes with the different authorities in Naples as well as in Milan. The king was aggrieved by the bull "In Coenâ Domini;" the pope would not hear mention of the "Exequatur Regium." The former accused the ecclesiastical functionaries of doing too much ; the latter thought the royal officers did too little. Extreme dissatisfaction often prevailed, as we have said, at the court of Madrid, and the king's confessor made bitter complaints, but no positive quarrel ensued. Either sovereign attributed the principal blame to the officers and advisers of the other ; they remained personally on very friendly terms.

When Philip on a certain occasion was ill, the pope raised his hands to heaven, imploring God to deliver him from that malady : the aged pontiff prayed that the Almighty would take some years from his own life and add them to that of the king, on whose existence so much more depended than on his own.

¹ Ripamonte, 857. He calls the first founders, Beccaria, Ferrara, and Morigia : Giussano, p. 442, gives the usual names.

And it was altogether in the spirit of the new ecclesiastical regulations that Spain was now governed. Philip had for a moment hesitated whether to permit the entire recognition of the edicts issued by the council of Trent or not. Gladly would he have limited the papal power, so far as regarded its right to make concessions at variance with those edicts; but the religious character of his monarchy was opposed to all attempts of this kind; he perceived that even the semblance of any serious difference with the Holy See must be carefully eschewed, if he would remain secure in the allegiance due to himself. The decrees of the council were therefore promulgated through the dominions of Philip, and the consequent regulations were strictly enforced. Here the principles of the rigidly Catholic party obtained the ascendancy. Carranza, archbishop of Toledo and the first ecclesiastic in Spain, was himself given over to the mercies of the Inquisition, in spite of his many claims to exemption; one of the members of the council of Trent, he had also contributed more than any other person, Pole only excepted, to the restoration of Catholicism in England, under Queen Mary. "I have no other object in life," he says of himself, "than that of suppressing heresy, and my efforts have received the divine aid; I have converted many who had departed from the faith; the bodies of certain men who were leaders in heretical opinions I have caused to be dug up and burnt; I have been called Chief Defender of the Faith, whether by Catholics or Protestants." But all these claims to reverence, all these unquestionable proofs of Catholicism, were not permitted to avail him against the claims of the Inquisition. Sixteen articles were discovered in his works, intimating an approximation towards Protestant opinion, especially in regard to justification; he suffered a long imprisonment in Spain, and underwent all the torments of a protracted trial; he was finally taken to Rome. Thus removed from the grasp of his personal enemies, he appeared to be receiving a great favour, but even in Rome he could not escape: the Inquisition condemned him to death.¹

¹ Llorente has devoted three long chapters of his History of the Inquisition to the circumstance of Carranza's trial.—Hist. de l'Inquisition, vol. iii. 183-315.

If such were the modes of procedure towards a person of so exalted a character, and in a case so doubtful, it will be obvious that little hope would remain for those whose heterodoxy admitted of no question, and whose station was less distinguished. Instances of such were still occasionally found in Spain, and all the relentless cruelty with which the traces of Jewish and Mahometan tenets had formerly been hunted down, was now turned against the Protestant opinions. One auto-da-fé followed close upon another, till every germ of the hated belief was extirpated. From the year 1570, few besides foreigners were brought before the Court of the Inquisition as guilty of Protestantism.¹

The Spanish government was not favourable to the Society of Jesus. Its members were said to be for the most part aliens to the pure blood of Spain, Jewish Christians, who were suspected of nourishing projects of revenge, to be taken at some future time, for all the miseries their unhappy race had been made to endure. The Jesuits were, on the contrary, all-powerful in Portugal, where they had made their rule absolute under the name of King Sebastian. Being also in the highest favour at Rome under Pius V, they made their influence in that country subservient to the views of the Curia.

Thus did the pontiff rule both peninsulas with an authority more unlimited than had been known for long periods by his predecessors; the decrees of the council of Trent were in practical activity through all Catholic countries. Every bishop subscribed the "professio fidei," wherein the substance of those dogmatic decisions promulgated by the council was contained, and Pius published the Roman catechism, in certain parts of which these same propositions are more diffusely expressed. All breviaries, not expressly issued by the papal see, or which had not been in use upwards of two hundred years, were abolished, and a new one was composed on the model of that used in the earliest periods by the principal churches of Rome. This the pontiff desired to see adopted universally.² A new missal was also prepared, "according to the rule and ritual of the holy fathers,"¹ and appointed for general use. The ecclesiastical seminaries received numerous pupils, monastic institutions were effectually reformed, and the Inquisition devoted itself with untiring vigilance and merciless severity, to guard the unity and inviolability of the faith.

¹ M'Crie's History of the Progress and Suppression of the Inquisition in Spain, p. 336.

² "Remotis iis, quae aliena et incerta essent."—Quoniam nobis: 9 Julii, 1568.

Governed by ordinances thus uniform, a strict alliance ensued between all these countries and states. This position of things was further promoted by the circumstance that France, involved in civil wars, had either renounced her former hostility to Spain, or was unable to give it effect. A second consequence also resulted from the troubles in France. From the events of any given period, certain political convictions of general influence are always elicited, which convictions then become a practical and motive power throughout the world over which they extend. Thus the Catholic sovereigns now thought they perceived that any change in the religion of a country involved the danger of destruction to the state. Pius IV had said that the Church could not support herself without the aid of the temporal princes, and these last were now persuaded that union with the Church was equally requisite to their security. Pius V did not fail to preach this doctrine continually in their ears, and in effect he lived to see all southern Christendom gathered around him for the purposes of a common enterprise.

The Ottoman power was still making rapid progress. Its ascendancy was secured in the Mediterranean, and its various attempts, first upon Malta, and next on Cyprus, rendered obvious the fact, that it was earnestly bent on the subjugation of the yet unconquered islands. Italy herself was menaced from Hungary and Greece. After long efforts, Pius succeeded in awakening the Catholic sovereigns to the perception that there was indeed imminent danger. The idea of a league between these princes was suggested to the pope by the attack on Cyprus; this he proposed to Venice on the one hand, and to Spain on the other. "When I received permission to negotiate with him on that subject," says the Venetian ambassador, "and communicated my instructions to that effect, he raised his hands to heaven, offering thanks to God, and promising that his every thought, and all the force he could command, should be devoted to that purpose."¹

¹ "Collatis omnibus cum vetustissimis nostrae Vaticanae bibliothecae aliisque undique conquisitis emendatis atque incorruptis codicibus."

Infinite were the troubles and labour required from the pontiff before he could remove the difficulties impeding the union of the two maritime powers: he contrived to associate with them the other states of Italy, and although in the beginning he had neither money, ships, nor arms, he yet found means to reinforce the fleet with some few papal galleys. He also contributed to the selection of Don John of Austria as leader, and managed to stimulate alike his ambition and religious ardour. From all this resulted a battle, the most successful in which Christendom had ever engaged with the Turks, that of Lepanto. The pontiff's mind was so intensely absorbed by the enterprise, that on the day of the engagement, he believed himself to witness the victory in a kind of trance. The achievement of this triumph inspired him with the most lofty self-confidence and the boldest prospects. In a few years he believed that the Ottoman power would be utterly subdued.

It would have been well if his energies had always been devoted to works so unquestionably legitimate, but this was not the fact; so exclusive, so imperious were his religious feelings, that he bore the very bitterest hatred to all who would not accept his tenets. And how strange a contradiction! the religion of meekness and humility is made the implacable persecutor of innocence and piety! But Pius V, born under the wings of the Inquisition, and reared in its principles, was incapable of perceiving this discrepancy; seeking with inexhaustible zeal to extirpate every trace of dissent that might yet lurk in Catholic countries, he persecuted with a yet more savage fury the avowed Protestants, who were either freed from his yoke or still engaged in the struggle. Not content with despatching such military forces as his utmost efforts could command, in aid of the French Catholics, he accompanied this with the monstrous and unheard-of injunction to their leader, Count Santafore, to "take no Huguenot prisoner, but instantly to kill every one that should fall into his hands."¹ When trouble arose in the Netherlands, Philip of Spain was at first undetermined as to the manner in which he should treat those provinces. Pius recommended an armed intervention, "for," said he, "if you negotiate without the eloquence of arms, you must receive laws; with arms in your hands, it is by yourself that they are imposed." The sanguinary measures of Alva were so acceptable to the pope, that he sent him the consecrated hat and sword as marks of his approval. There is no proof that he was aware of the preparations for the massacre of St. Bartholomew, but he did things that leave no doubt of his approving it as cordially as did his successor.

¹ Suriano: "Havuta la risoluzione — andai subito alla audienza, benche era di notte et l'hora incommoda et S. S^a travagliata per li accidenti seguiti quel giorno per la coronatione del duca di Fiorenza ed il protesto dell' ambasciatore Cesareo: (against it), e comunicata la commissione che haveva, S. S^a si allegro tutta."

How wonderful is this union of upright purpose, elevation of mind, austerity, and devout religious feeling, with morose bigotry, rancorous hatred, and sanguinary eagerness in persecution!

Such was the spirit in which Pius V lived and died.² When he felt that death was approaching, he once more visited the seven churches, "in order," as he said, "to take leave of those holy places." Thrice did he kiss the lowest step of the Scala Santa. He had promised at one time not only to expend the whole treasure of the church, the very chalices and crosses included, on an expedition against England, but even to appear himself at the head of the army. Certain fugitive Catholics from England presenting themselves on his way, he declared that "fain would he pour forth his own blood for their sakes." The principal subject of his last words was the League, for the prosperous continuation of which he had made all possible preparations; the last coins he sent from his hand were destined for this purpose.¹ His fancy was haunted to the last moment by visions of his different undertakings. He had no doubt of their success, believing that, of the very stones, God would, if needful, raise up the man demanded for so sacred a work.

¹ Catena : Vita di Pio V, p. 85 : "Pio si dolse del conte che non avesse il comandamento di lui osservato d'ammazzar subito qualunque heretico gli fosse venuto alle mani."

² He died on the 1st of May, 1572.

His loss was felt more immediately than he had himself anticipated ; but also, there was a unity established ; a force called into existence, by whose inherent power the course into which he had directed the nations would inevitably be confirmed and maintained.

¹ Informatione dell' infirmità de Pio V : " Havendo in sua stanza in una cassetina 13^m. sc. per donare e fare elemosine di sua mano, due giorni avanti sua morte fece chiamare il depositario della camera e levarli, dicendo che sarien boni per la lega."

BOOK IV

STATE AND COURT.—THE TIMES OF GREGORY XIII AND
SIXTUS V

STATE AND COURT.—THE TIMES. OF GREGORY XIII. AND SIXTUS V

WITH renewed and concentrated forces Catholicism now advanced to confront the Protestant faith.

Comparing these two mighty antagonists, we perceive that Catholicism possessed an immense advantage, inasmuch as all its movements were directed by a common chief, and tended towards a common centre. Not only could the pope combine the strength of other Catholic powers for one common effort, but he had also dominions of his own sufficiently extensive and powerful to contribute largely towards a successful result.

It is in a new aspect that we are henceforth to consider the States of the Church.

This sovereignty had been founded by the struggles of different pontiffs to exalt their families to princely dignity, or to secure paramount influence for themselves among the temporal powers, those of the Italian states more particularly. In neither of these purposes did they succeed to the extent of their wishes, and the renewal of these struggles had now become altogether impossible. The alienation of Church property was forbidden by a special law, while the Spaniards were now too powerful in Italy to leave hope of a successful competition with them. The temporal sovereignty had on the other hand become auxiliary to the Church, and the financial resources presented by the former were of the utmost importance to the general development and welfare; but, before proceeding further, it will be needful to examine more closely the administration of the papal see, in that form which it gradually assumed during the course of the sixteenth century.

I. ADMINISTRATION OF THE STATES OF THE CHURCH

A finely situated, rich, and noble territory had fallen to the lot of the popes.

The writers of the sixteenth century can find no words that suffice them to extol its fertility. How fair are the plains around Bologna and throughout Romagna! How brightly does a rich productiveness combine with beauty down the slopes of the Apennines! "We travelled," say the Venetian ambassadors in 1522, "from Macerata to Tolentino, through a district of surpassing loveliness. Hills and valleys were clothed with grain; through an extent of thirty miles nothing else was to be seen. Uncultivated land we could not find for the breadth of a foot. We thought it impossible to gather so vast a quantity of corn, how then shall it be consumed?" In Romagna 40,000 stara of corn were yearly produced beyond what was required for consumption; for this there was a great demand, and after supplying the mountain districts about Urbino, Tuscany, and Bologna, 35,000 stara were sometimes exported by sea. On the one coast, Venice was supplied from Romagna and the March,¹ whilst Genoa on the other, and sometimes even Naples, were provided for by the territory of Viterbo and the Patrimony of St. Peter. In one of his bulls for 1566, Pius V exalts the divine favour, by whose permission it is that Rome, who was formerly not able to subsist without foreign corn, had now not only abundance for herself, but could also come in aid of her neighbours, and even of foreigners, by land and sea, with the produce of her own Campagna.² In the year 1589, the exports of corn from the States of the Church were estimated at the annual value of five hundred thousand scudi.¹ The various districts were also famed, each for its peculiar production ; as Perugia for hemp ; Faenza for flax ; Viterbo for both ;² Cesena for its wine, which was exported ; Rimini for its oil ; Bologna for woad ; San Lorenzo for manna. The vintage of Montefiascone was known and esteemed the world over. In the Campagna was then produced a breed of horses but little inferior to those of Naples. Around Nettuno and Terracina there was excellent hunting, especially of the wild boar. There were lakes abounding in fish. They had besides salt-works, alum-works, and marble-quarries. In a word, the country supplied whatever could be desired for the enjoyment of life in the richest profusion.

¹ Badoer, Relatione, 1591. The friendship of Romagna for Venice was based on the recollection of "quanto importa la vicinà di questa città per ben vendere per l'ordinario le loro biade, vini, frutti, guadi et altre cose, riportandone all' incontro boni danari."

² Jurisdictio consulum artis agriculturæ urbis, 9 Sept. 1566: Bullar. Cocquel. iv. ii. 314.

This fine territory was equally well situated for general intercourse with the world. Ancona possessed a flourishing trade. "It is a beautiful place," say those same ambassadors of 1522, "full of merchants, principally Greeks and Turks ; we were assured that of these, some had transacted business in preceding years to the amount of five hundred thousand ducats." In the year 1549, we find two hundred Greek families settled there as merchants, and with a church of their own. The harbour was full of caravels from the Levant. There were Armenians, Turks, Florentines, Lucchesi, Venetians, and Jews from East and West. The wares exposed by the dealers consisted of silks, wool, leather, Flemish lead and cloths. Luxury increased, house-rent became high, physicians and schoolmasters were more numerous, and better paid than at any previous time.³

It is not, however, so much on the commercial readiness

¹ Giovanni Giusti, Relatione, 1589 : "La Romagna e la Marca sola si mette che alcune volte abbia mandato fuori 60^m. rubbia di grano e piu di 30^m. di menudi. Il paese di Roma e lo stato di là dell' Alpi quasi ogni anno somministra il viver al paese di Genova ed altri luoghi circonvicini : onde dell' uscita di grani e di biade dello stato ecclesiastico si tien per cosa certa che ogni anno entri in esso valente di 500^m. sc. almeno : nè all' incontro ha bisogno di cose di fuori se non di poco momento et in poca stima, che sono specierie e cose da vestirsi di nobili e persone principali."

² Voyage de Montaigne, ii. 488.

³ Saracini, Notizie istoriche della Città d'Ancona : Roma, 1675, p. 362.

and activity of the papal subjects as on their bravery, that writers of the period love to dwell. Not unfrequently are the inhabitants of each district set before us, distinguished by the varying shades of their military character. The people of Perugia are "steady soldiers;" those of Romagna, "brave but improvident." The inhabitants of Spoleto are fertile in expedients and the arts of strategy; those of Bologna full of courage, but difficult to hold in discipline; the men of the March are given to plunder; the people of Faenza surpass all others in firmness when charged in battle, or in the sustained pursuit of the retreating enemy. The inhabitants of Forlì excel in the execution of difficult manœuvres; those of Fermo in the use of the lance.¹ The whole population, says one of the Venetians before referred to, are apt for the uses of war, and martial by nature. No sooner do they leave their homes than they are fitted for any mode of service. They are equally good in sieges as in the open field, and bear with little difficulty the toils and privations of a campaign.² Venice ever drew her best troops from the March and from Romagna; therefore it was that the republic always prized so highly the good-will of the dukes of Urbino; we constantly find officers from that district in their service. It was said of this country, that captains for all the princes in the world might be found in it. The fact was frequently alluded to, that from these lands had gone forth that company of St. George, with whose aid Alberic of Barbiano had extirpated the hordes of foreign mercenaries, and restored the fame of Italian arms. It was still the same race of men as that whence had proceeded the legions who of old had so largely contributed to the establishment of the Roman empire.³ They have not indeed continued to merit

¹ Landi, Quaestiones Forcianae: Neapoli, 1536; a book filled with minute and remarkable notices of the state of Italy at that time.

² Suriano, 1570: "Quanto a soldati, è commune opinione che nello stato della chiesa siano i migliori di tutto il resto d'Italia anzi d'Europa."

³ Lorenzo Priuli, Relatione, 1586: "Lo stato pieno di viveri per darne anco a popoli vicini, pieno di huomini bellicosi"—he specifies the families of Genga, Carpagna, and Malatesta—"Pareno tutti questi popoli nati et allevati nella militia. E molto presto si metteria insieme molto buona gente toccando il tamburo."

these emphatic encomiums through all periods of their history, yet the last great military leader, by whom these men were employed beyond their own frontiers, is known to have preferred them to any other of his Italian troops, nay, even to a considerable part of his French soldiery.

These rich and populous territories, with their brave inhabitants, were now subjected to the peaceful and spiritual government of the popes. It is for us to examine the basis and organization of this ecclesiastical State as it developed its resources under their rule.

It was founded, as were most of the Italian sovereignties, on the more or less rigid limitation of that independence to which the municipalities had, in the course of the century, almost everywhere attained.

Even during the fifteenth century, the priors of Viterbo, seated on their stone seats before the door of the town-hall, received the oath of the podestà, sent them by the pontiff or his representative.¹

When the city of Fano placed itself under the immediate sovereignty of the papal see, in 1463, it made certain conditions: first, that to all future time the city should hold immediately of the papal throne; next that it should select its own podestà, whose appointment should need no further confirmation, and that for twenty years it should be subjected to no new impost; finally, it stipulated for all benefits arising from the sale of salt, with various other immunities.²

A prince, so arbitrary as was Caesar Borgia, could yet not avoid the grant of certain privileges to the cities constituting his principality. Thus he resigned revenues to the town of Sinigaglia, which till then had invariably been claimed by the sovereign.³

How much more, then, would these concessions be expected from Julius II, whose ambition it was to present himself as a liberator from tyranny. He reminded the Perugians himself that the best years of his youth had been passed within their walls. When he drove Baglioni from

¹ Feliciano Bussi, Istoria di Viterbo, p. 59.

² Amiani, Memorie istoriche della Città di Fano, t. ii. p. 4.

³ Siena, Storia di Sinigaglia, App. n. 6.

Perugia, he did not refuse to recall the exiles or to reinstate the peaceful magistrates, the priori; he conferred increased emoluments on the professors of the university, and invaded no one of the ancient immunities of the city: for a long time it paid a few thousand ducats only as a recognition of his sovereignty; and even under Clement VII I find a calculation of how many troops Perugia could bring into the field, precisely as though it had been a completely free municipality.¹

Nor was Bologna more closely restricted. Together with the forms of municipal independence, it retained many of the essential attributes: the administration of the town revenues was entirely in its own hands, it maintained troops of its own, and the papal legate received a salary from the city.

The towns of Romagna were seized by Julius II during the Venetian war; but he did not annex a single one to the pontificate without first consenting to restrictive conditions, or conferring new and fixed rights; these stipulations were always referred to in later times. The political relation with the Church into which they had entered by these treaties received the title of "Ecclesiastical Freedom."²

Thus constituted, the State as a whole bore a certain resemblance to that of Venice. In each, the political power had at one time resided in the commune, and this had for the most part subjected other smaller communities over which it held sway. In the Venetian states these paramount municipalities had submitted themselves under conditions strictly defined, without resigning the whole of their independence to the control of the nobili of Venice. In the States of the Church these same municipalities became subject to the commonwealth of the Curia; for as in Venice it was the nobility that formed the commonwealth, so in Rome this was represented by the court. The dignity of the prelacy was not indeed absolutely indispensable as a qualification, even for the supreme powers of the municipalities, during the first half of this century; secular vice-legates were frequent in Perugia, while in Romagna it seemed to be almost an established rule that a lay president should direct the administration. It would sometimes happen that laymen would acquire an almost unlimited power and influence, as did Jacopo Salviati under Clement VII, but in such cases they were ever connected in some manner with the Curia ; they belonged in one way or another to the pope, and were thus members of that corporation.

¹ Suriano, Relatione di Fiorenza, 1533.

² Rainaldus alludes to this, but very briefly. Touching Ravenna, see Hieronymi Rubei Historiarum Ravennatum, lib. viii. p. 660.

At this period the towns would seem to have had no liking for secular governors ; they preferred and requested to be ruled by prelates, as holding it more honourable to obey an ecclesiastic of high rank. Compared with a German principality, and its carefully organized system of well-defined grades, the Italian looks at first sight little better than a mere anarchy ; but in point of fact the partition of rights and privileges was quite as clearly understood, and as rigidly adhered to in the latter as in the former. The supreme authorities of a city, for example, were held in check by the nobles, the nobles by the burghers (cittadini), the subjugated commune kept jealous watch over the acts of its superior, and the rural populations over the towns. It is a striking fact that the establishment of provincial governments was in no one instance adopted in Italy ; certain provincial assemblies were indeed held in the papal states, and even received the imposing name of "parliament," but there must have been something adverse to institutions of this character in the manners or modes of thought of Italians, since no one of them ever attained to effectual or enduring influence.

From what has been said, it will be obvious that if the municipal constitution had acquired that complete development of which it was susceptible, and towards which it seemed to tend (by the limitation which on the one hand it imposed on the governing authority, and that presented to the powers of the communes, and the multitude of individual privileges on the other), it would then have exhibited the principle of stability in its most significant aspect ; a political system, based on prerogatives clearly defined, and on checks that were reciprocally effectual.

Considerable progress towards a constitution of this character was made by the Venetian states, and certain steps, but much less decided ones, were taken in the same direction by those of the Church.

This difference was inevitable from the diversity of origin in each government. In Venice the reins were held by a corporation, self-governing and hereditary, which considered the supreme power as its legitimate property. The Roman Curia, on the contrary, was in continual fluctuation, every new conclave infusing new elements, the compatriots of each successive pope invariably obtained a large portion of the public business. Among the Venetians, appointments to office proceeded from the corporation itself; in Rome they were to be gained only from the favour of the pope. The rulers of Venice were held to their duties by rigorous laws, close inspection, and regard to the honour of their body. The Roman authorities were rather incited by hope of promotion than restrained by fear of punishment; both depending principally on the favour and good-will of the pontiff, they thus enjoyed a more extensive freedom of action.

We shall proceed to shew that the papal government had from the first secured to itself a larger degree of authority.

Of this fact we find convincing proof by a comparison of the concessions made to the municipalities they conquered, by Rome and Venice respectively; a favourable opportunity for such comparison presents itself in the case of Faenza. This city, which had capitulated to Venice some years before its surrender to the ecclesiastical state, had made conditions with each government.¹ It had, for example, demanded from both that no new impost should ever be laid on them, but with consent of the majority in the great council of Faenza. To this the Venetians agreed without reserve; whereas the pontiff added the significant clause, "unless it shall appear to him advisable to do otherwise for good and sufficient causes." I will not multiply instances, a similar state of matters prevailing throughout; one other fact in proof shall suffice. The Venetians had assented without hesitation to the demand that all criminal judgments should be referred to the podestà and his court (Curia). The pope confirms this privilege in its general import, but makes the important exception, "In cases of high-treason or of similar crimes, calculated to cause popular irritation, the authority of the governor shall step in." It is obvious then that the papal government assumed from the very outset a much more effective exercise of the sovereign authority than did that of Venice.¹

¹ Historie di Faenza, fatica di Giulio Cesare Tonduzzi, Faenza, 1675, contains, p. 562, the capitulations concluded with the Venetians in 1501, and those agreed to by Julius II in 1510.

But it must also be admitted that this extension of the ecclesiastical powers was greatly facilitated by the municipalities themselves.

In these subjugated towns, and in that day, the middle classes, the burghers, traders, and artisans, while their gains sufficed to procure them the means of life, remained peaceable and obedient; but the patricians, the nobles in whom the municipal authority was vested, were in perpetual commotion and tumult; they practised no arts, they paid little attention to agriculture, had no disposition to intellectual improvement, and did not greatly care even for skill in arms; they were wholly devoted to the pursuit of their particular feuds and enmities. The old factions of Guelphs and Ghibellines were still in existence, they had been revived by the late wars, in which victory was sometimes with one and sometimes with the other; all the families belonging to these two parties were well known, with the side they adopted. In Faenza, Ravenna, and Forlì, the Ghibellines had the upper hand, in Rimini the Guelphs were the stronger. But in all these towns the weaker party still maintained itself alive. In Cesena and Imola they were nearly balanced. Among these then, even in times of external peace, a secret warfare was incessantly proceeding; each man was specially occupied in seeking to depress his opponent of the adverse faction, and to cast him into the shade.² The leaders had always adherents from the lowest classes at their command ; wild, determined bravoos, of fierce and wandering habits, who were ever prepared with offers of service to those whom they knew to be in fear of enemies, or to have injuries demanding vengeance ; these men were always ready to commit murder for a sum of money.

¹ Its mode of employing this authority may be gathered from Paul III, who tells us in 1547, that "ceux qui viennent nouvellement au papat viennent pauvres, obligés de promesses, et la depense qu'ils font pour s'asseurer dans les terres de l'Eglise monte plus que le profit des premieres années." The Cardinal de Guise to the king of France, in Ribier, ii. 77.

² Relazione della Romagna (Bibl. Alt.); "Li nobili hanno seguito di molte persone, delle quali alcune volte si vagliono ne' consigli per

The result of these incessant feuds was, that the cities became less vigilant in the maintenance of their rights, for as each party distrusted the other, so neither would permit authority to rest in its opponent's hands. On the arrival of the president or legate in the province, the question was not whether the municipal rights would be respected, but rather which party would be favoured by the new functionary. It would be difficult to describe the exultation of the successful party, or the dismay of its rivals, when this was ascertained. Infinite prudence was required on the part of the legate, the most influential men were ready to attach themselves to his side, they did their utmost to render themselves acceptable to him, affected earnest zeal for the interest of the state, and acquiesced in all the plans he might propose for its advantage ; but all this was frequently for no other purpose than that of placing themselves well with the governor, and by gaining his confidence, become all the better enabled to persecute the party they abhorred.¹

The position of the provincial barons was somewhat different. They were for the most part very poor, but ambitious, and liberal to prodigality, usually keeping open house, although it was known that their expenditure largely conseguire qualche carica o per sè o per altri, per potere vincere o per impedire all' altri qualche richiesta : ne' giudicii per provare et alcune volte per testificare, nelle inimicitie per fare vendette, ingiurie : alcuni ancora a Ravenna, Imola e Faenza usavano di contrabbandare grano." [The nobles have numerous dependants, of whom they avail themselves in the councils to obtain offices, either for themselves or others ; also to further their own purposes and hinder their neighbours' ; these aid them even in their suits before the tribunals, or bear witness for them, and take part in their quarrels, or procure them revenge ; some too, about Ravenna, Imola, and Faenza, are in the habit of smuggling grain.]

¹ Relatione di Mons^{re}. Rev^{mo}. Giov. P. Ghisilieri, al P. Gregorio XIII, tornando egli dal presidentato di Romagna. From Tonduzzi (Historie di Faenza, p. 673) we see that Ghisilieri went into the province in 1578.

exceeded their income, and this without exception. They had always adherents in the towns, and sometimes employed these men for the most illegal purposes ; but their principal care was to preserve a perfect understanding with their peasantry, in whose hands remained the greater part of the soil, which constituted all their wealth. The advantages of high birth, and the prerogatives of gentle blood, were sufficiently appreciated on the one part, and held in profound reverence on the other, through all the lands of the south ; but distinction of ranks was not marked in the same manner as in northern countries, presenting no obstacle to a close personal intimacy. The peasants lived with their barons in a sort of fraternal subordination, nor could it easily be told whether the peasantry were more ready to offer service and obedience, or the barons to render aid and protection ; their connection had a character that was even patriarchal.¹ One cause for this probably was, that the baron abstained from giving his peasantry any cause for appeal to the State authorities, being but little disposed to regard with reverence the feudal supremacy of the papal see ; as to the peasants, they considered this supremacy, and the legate's claim to jurisdiction (not in cases of appeal only, but also in the first instance), by no means as claims of right, but rather as the consequence of an unfortunate political conjuncture, that would soon pass away.

There were also found in certain districts, more especially in Romagna, independent communities of peasants.² These were large clans, descended from a common stock ; lords in their own villages, generally half-savage, all well-armed, and especially practised in the use of the arquebus, they may perhaps be best compared with the free Greek and

¹ Relatione della Romagna : "Essendosi aggiustati gli uni all' humore degli altri." [Each bending to the humour of the other.]

² The peasants also sometimes freed themselves from the yoke of the towns. See Ghisilieri : "Scossi da quel giogo e recati quasi corpo diverso da quelle città (e.g. Forlì, Cesena) si governano con certe loro leggi separate sotti il governo d'un protettore eletto da loro medesimi, li quali hanno amplissima autorità di far le resolutioni necessarie per li casi occorrenti alli contadini." [Withdrawing as a body from those cities, they govern themselves by separate laws, under a president chosen by themselves, who has power to decide in all their affairs.]

Sclavonian communities, who had preserved their privileges among the Venetians; or with those of Candia, the Morea, and Dalmatia, who had regained their lost independence from the Turks. In the States of the Church these peasants also adhered to one or other of the different factions: thus, the Cavina clan, with the Scardocci and Solaroli, were Ghibellines; the Manbelli, Cerroni, and Serra were Guelphs. In the district of the Serra clan there was a hill, which served as an asylum for those who had committed any offence. The most important of these clans was the Cerroni, whose numbers had extended across the frontier into the Florentine territory; they were divided into two branches, the Rinaldi and Ravagli, between whom, in spite of their common origin, there existed a bitter feud. They maintained a sort of hereditary connection with many among the noblest families of the towns, and also with certain eminent jurists, by whom the faction was supported in all questions with the laws. Throughout Romagna, there was no single family, however distinguished, that might not have been injured by these banded peasants. The Venetians took care to have always an interest in one or other of their chiefs, for the purpose of securing their aid in case of war.

If these populations, as we have before remarked, had been well united, the Roman prelates would have found it difficult to assert their authority, but in their dissensions the government found its strength. To this effect a president of Romagna, writing to Gregory XIII, expresses himself, as I find, in his report: "Very difficult is the task of governing, when the people hold themselves too closely together; let them be disunited, and the mastery is then easily gained."¹ There was, besides, another circumstance acting in favour of government. This was the formation of a party consisting of those peaceable men of the middle classes who desired to live tranquilly, and were not attached to either faction. In Fano this party entered into an association called the "Holy Union," compelled to this, as the record of their institution sets forth, "because all the town is become full of robbers and murderers, so that, not only are those in jeopardy who join themselves to the several feuds, but also those who would fain eat their bread in the sweat of their brow." They bound themselves, by an oath in the church, as brethren for life and death, to maintain the tranquillity of the town, and to exterminate those who sought to disturb it.¹ They were favoured by the government, from whom they received permission to carry arms, and we find them throughout Romagna under the name of the Pacifici. From this body was gradually constituted a kind of plebeian magistracy. Adherents of government might also be found among the free peasants; the Manbelli, for example, attached themselves to the court of the legate; they arrested banditti, and acted as wardens of the frontiers, a service that procured them increased estimation among the neighbouring clans.² Local jealousies, the contests arising between cities and the surrounding villages, with various other internal differences, all contributed to increase the power of the government.

¹ Ghisilieri: "Siccome il popolo disunito facilmente si domina, così difficilmente si regge quando è troppo unito."

Here, then, in place of that respect for law, good order, and stability, which, judging from its theory only, we should have expected this constitution of the State to produce, we find the turbulent strife of factions, intervention of the government so long as these remained at variance, reaction and opposition of the municipalities when they are again united; violence acting in support of the law, violence opposed to the law; every man trying to what extent he might rebel with impunity.

Immediately after the accession of Leo X, the Florentines, who had obtained a large share in the administration, ¹ It was not unlike the Hermandad. Amiani, Memorie di Fano, ii. 146, gives us their formula founded on the text: "Beati pacifici, quia filii Dei vocabuntur." From this their name in other towns may have been derived.

² According to the Relatione della Romagna, they also called themselves "huomini da Schieto," from their dwelling-place. "Huomini," it says, "che si fanno molto riguardare, sono Guelfi: la corte di Romagna si è valuta dell' opera loro molto utilmente, massime in havere in mano banditi et in ovviare alle fraudi che si fanno in estrarre bestiami dalle montagne." [Men who made themselves much respected, they are Guelphs, and the court of Romagna found them very useful, particularly in capturing banditti, and preventing the cattle from being carried off from the mountains.]

exercised the rights of the Curia with the most oppressive violence. Deputations from the cities were seen to arrive in Rome, one after another, entreating relief from their burdens. Ravenna declared itself prepared to surrender to the Turks, rather than endure the continuance of such a system.¹ During vacancies of the pontificate, it frequently happened that the ancient feudal lords would return to power, and were not expelled by the new pope without considerable difficulty. The cities, on the other hand, dreaded being alienated from the papal see. A cardinal, a connection of the pope, or perhaps some neighbouring prince, would occasionally offer a sum of money to the "camera," for the right of governing one or other of these towns. Aware of this, the towns, on their part, had agents and envoys at Rome, whose office it was to discover all projects of this sort on the instant of their formation, and to interpose for their defeat; in this they were most frequently successful; they were, however, sometimes compelled to employ force against the papal authorities, and even against the pontiff's troops. In the history of nearly all these towns are found instances of very determined insubordination. It once happened in Faenza that the citizens had a regular battle with the Swiss guards of Leo X. This was in the summer of 1521. They fought furiously in the streets, and the Swiss had succeeded in gathering themselves into one body on the market-place; but the townsmen having barricaded all the avenues leading from it, the Swiss were content to depart quietly, since they could do so unmolested, when one of the barriers had been removed. The anniversary of this day was long afterwards celebrated in Faenza with religious solemnities and rejoicings.² Jesi, again, though by no means a town of importance, had yet courage to attack the vice-governor in his palace, on the 25th of November, 1528. He had demanded certain marks of honour, which the inhabitants refused. The peasants united themselves to the citizens, they took into their pay a hundred Albanians who chanced to be in the neighbourhood, and drove the vice-governor, with his followers, from the town. The chronicler of Jesi, in other respects a most devout Catholic, relates this fact with infinite complacency. "My native town," says he, "now seeing herself restored to her primitive freedom, resolved solemnly to celebrate the anniversary of this day, at the public expense."¹

¹ Marino Zorzi, Relatione of 1517: "Le terre di Romagna è in gran combustione e desordine: li vien fatta poca justitia: e lui orator ha visto tal x man di oratori al cardinal di Medici, che negotia le faccende lamentandosi di mali portamenti fanno quelli rettori loro." [The country of Romagna is in great commotion, little justice is done there: I who speak, have seen as many as ten deputations going to Cardinal Medici, lamenting the state of things there; and, above all, loudly bewailing the lawless conduct of their rulers.]

² Tonduzzi, Historie di Faenza, p. 609.

But other results were sure to proceed from these acts of violence; new oppressions for example, punishments, and closer restrictions. All such occasions were gladly seized by the government, as affording a pretext for depriving the towns that still retained any efficient part of their ancient independence, of its last traces, and reducing them to entire subjection.

Of this we have remarkable examples in the histories of Ancona and Perugia.

From Ancona the pontiffs received a very small annual tribute only, as a mere recognition of their sovereignty. The insufficiency of this became all the more apparent as the town advanced in riches and prosperity. The revenues of Ancona were estimated by the court at 50,000 scudi, and it was found to be intolerable that the local nobility should divide so large a sum among themselves. It chanced that the city not only refused the payment of new imposts, but also took forcible possession of a castle to which it had claims. This occasioned a violent misunderstanding. The mode of asserting their rights sometimes adopted by governments in that day is worthy of notice. The papal officers drove off the cattle from the March of Ancona, by way of levying the new taxes. This they called making reprisals.

But Clement VII was not content with these "reprisals." He waited only for a favourable opportunity to make himself really master of Ancona, and this he made no scruple of employing artifice to bring about.

¹ Baldassini, Memorie istoriche dell' antichissima Città di Jesi: Jesi, 1744, p. 256.

Declaring that the Turkish power, emboldened by its recent successes in Egypt and Rhodes, and the extent of its influence in the Mediterranean, might be daily expected to attack Italy, he caused a fortress to be erected at Ancona. Many Turkish ships were constantly at anchor off Ancona, and the pontiff expressed extreme apprehension for its safety, defenceless as it was, alleging this as the only motive for raising the fortress. He sent Antonio Sangallo to construct the works, which proceeded with excessive rapidity, and a small garrison soon after appeared to take possession. This was the moment that Clement had awaited: matters having arrived so far, the governor of the March, Monsignore Bernardino della Barba, who, though a priest, was a man of martial character, arrived before Ancona one morning in September of 1532, with an imposing force which the jealousy of the neighbouring cities had supplied to him. Having seized one of the gates, he marched to the market-place and drew up his troops before the palace. Suspecting no evil, the Anziani, but recently chosen by lot, were peaceably abiding here, with the badges of the supreme dignity around them; Della Barba entered with his escort of officers, and with little ceremony informed them that "the pope had determined to take the uncontrolled government of Ancona into his own hands." There was no possibility of opposing effectual resistance, for though the younger nobles hastily gathered a few bands of devoted adherents from the neighbouring villages, the elders, perceiving that the papal troops were prepared by their new fortifications for every emergency, refused to expose the city to devastation and ruin: they submitted, therefore, to what they saw was unavoidable.

The Anziani vacated the palace, and immediately after appeared the new legate, Benedetto degli Accolti, from whom the Camera Apostolica had received promise of twenty thousand scudi annually for the right of government in Ancona.

And now its position was changed entirely: all arms were required to be surrendered, and sixty-four of the principal nobles were banished; the magistracy was placed in different hands; portions of the administration were entrusted to persons who were not noble, and to the inhabitants of the districts surrounding. The old statutes were no longer suffered to form the rule of government.

Woe to him who ventured to deviate from the new regulations. Some of the principal nobles incurred the suspicion of conspiracy,—they were instantly seized, condemned, and beheaded. On the following day a carpet was spread in the market-place; on this were laid the bodies, each with a burning torch beside it; and thus they remained through the whole day.

The inhabitants of Ancona were indeed relieved by Paul III from some portion of the severe restrictions they at first suffered, but their subjection was none the less complete; their former independence he was by no means inclined to restore.¹

This pontiff was, in fact, more disposed to fix than to remove the fetters of the conquered cities in most instances, as for example in that of Perugia, for whose subjugation he employed the same Bernardino della Barba.

The price of salt being doubled by Paul III, the people of Perugia declared that they were justified by their privileges in refusing to pay it. For this the pope excommunicated them; and the citizens, assembling in the churches, elected a magistracy of "twenty-five defenders." They laid the keys of their town before a crucifix in the market-place, and both sides took up arms.

A general commotion was excited by the revolt of so important a city, and very grave consequences would doubtless have ensued had there been war in any other part of Italy; but as all was tranquil, the assistance on which the inhabitants had calculated from surrounding states could not be rendered.

Accordingly, when Pier Luigi Farnese appeared before the town with an army of ten thousand Italians and three thousand Spaniards, Perugia, though possessing considerable power, had yet not wherewith to oppose a force so considerable. The government of the twenty-five, too, was rather distinguished by violence and tyranny than by prudence and careful measures for the defence of the town; they did not even provide money to pay the troops brought to their aid by a member of the Baglioni family. Ascanio Colonna, who also resisted the same impost, was their only ally, and he confined himself to driving off cattle from the domains of the Church, nor could he be prevailed on to afford a more effectual assistance.

¹ Saracini, Notizie storiche della Città d'Ancona, ii. xi. p. 335.

Thus Perugia, after a brief enjoyment of liberty, was again reduced to subjection, and surrendered on the third of June, 1540. Clothed in long mourning dresses, with ropes round their necks, the deputies of the city presented themselves beneath the portico of St. Peter, and kneeling at the feet of the pontiff, entreated his pardon.

This was not refused; but their liberties were entirely destroyed, and all their rights and privileges repealed.

And now Bernardino della Barba arrived in Perugia, and dealt with that city as he had done with Ancona. The inhabitants were compelled to deliver up their arms; the chains with which they had been accustomed to close their streets were taken away; the houses of the "twenty-five," who had themselves escaped in time, were razed to the ground, and on the site of that inhabited by the Baglioni, a fortress was constructed. The citizens were obliged to pay the expense of all. A chief magistrate was now appointed, whose name sufficiently denotes the character of his duties; he was called "the conservator of ecclesiastical obedience." The ancient title of "prior" was, indeed, restored to this functionary by a subsequent pontiff, but the restitution of his former powers did not accompany it.¹

By the same force that had subjugated Perugia, Ascanio Colonna was also put down and expelled from all his strongholds.

These repeated and successful achievements effected an immense augmentation of the papal authority in the States of the Church,—neither city nor baron dared now presume to oppose it. The independent municipalities had submitted one after another, and the Roman court had at length drawn the entire resources of the country into its own hands, to be disposed of for the furtherance of its own purposes.

¹ Mariotti, Memorie storiche civili ed ecclesiastiche della Città di Perugia e suo contado; Perugia, 1806, gives us authentic and minute accounts of these events, vol. i. pp. 113–160; and again refers to them on p. 634.

Let us now examine the manner in which these resources were administered.

2. FINANCES

In the first instance we must proceed to make ourselves acquainted with the system of the papal finances, and the rather as this system is important, not only as regards the Roman states, but also because of the example furnished by it to all Europe.

We have first to observe that the system of exchanges adopted in the middle ages originated chiefly in the nature of the papal revenues, which, due from all parts of the world, were to be transmitted to the Curia from every separate country: but it is equally worthy of remark, that the system of national debt by which we are even now enveloped, and which maintains so important an influence on the operations of commerce, was first fully developed in the States of the Church.

There has doubtless been justice in the complaints raised against the exactions of Rome during the fifteenth century, but it is also true that of the proceeds a small part only passed into the hands of the pope. Pius II enjoyed the obedience of all Europe, yet he once suffered so extreme a dearth of money that he was forced to restrict his household and himself to one meal a day! The two hundred thousand ducats required for the Turkish war that he was meditating had to be borrowed; and the petty expedients, adopted by many popes, of demanding from a prince, a bishop, or a grand-master, who might have some cause before the court, the gift of a gold cup filled with ducats, or a present of rich furs,¹ only show the depressed and wretched condition of their resources.

¹ Voigt, Stimmen aus Rom über den päpstlichen Hof im funfzehnten Jahrhundert, in F. von Raumer's Historisches Taschenbuch for

There is no doubt that money reached the court, if not in the extravagant sums that many have believed, yet to a very considerable extent: but, arrived so far, it was at once dispersed through channels innumerable. A large portion, for example, was absorbed by the revenues of those offices, which it had long been the practice to dispose of by sale. The income of these offices was principally derived from perquisites and fees, and but slight restraint was imposed on the exactions of those who had purchased them. The price at which each of these appointments was resold as it became vacant, was all that recurred to the papal coffers.

If then the pontiff desired to undertake any costly enterprise, he was compelled to find some extraordinary expedient for procuring the means; jubilees and indulgences were thus most welcome auxiliaries; incited by these, the piety of the faithful secured him an ample resource. He had also another mode of gaining supplies at his need. He had but to create new offices, when the sale of these was sure to afford him a respectable amount. This was an extraordinary sort of loan, and one for which the Church paid heavy interest, which had to be provided for by an increase of the imposts. The practice had long prevailed; an authentic register existing in the house of Chigi enumerates nearly six hundred and fifty saleable offices, of which the income amounted to about one hundred thousand scudi.¹ These were for the most part, procurators, registrars, abbreviators, correctors, notaries, secretaries, nay, even messengers and doorkeepers, whose increased numbers were continually raising the expense of a bull or brief. It was indeed for that very purpose that their offices took the particular form assigned them; as to the duties connected with each, these were little or nothing.

1833, contains numerous remarks on this subject. Whoever has access to the work, Silesia vor und seit dem Jahre 1740, will find there, ii. 483, a satire of the fifteenth century, not badly done, on this monstrous system of present-making: "Passio domini papae secundum marcam auri et argenti."

¹ Gli ufficii piu antichi: MS. Bibliotheca Chigi, No. ii. 50. There are 651 offices, and 98,340 scudi, before the creation of Sixtus IV. So little truth is there in the assertion of Onuphrius Panvinus, that Sixtus IV was the first pontiff who sold them (p. 348).

It will be readily imagined that succeeding popes, involved as they were in the politics of Europe, would eagerly have recourse to so convenient a method of replenishing their coffers. Sixtus IV, proceeding by the advice of his prothonotary, Sinolfo, founded whole colleges, the places in which he sold for a few hundred ducats each; most curious are the titles that some of them bore. There was the college, for example, "of the hundred Janissaries," who were nominated for one hundred thousand ducats, and whose appointments were then paid from the profits arising on bulls and the proceeds of the first-fruits (annates).¹ "Notariats" and "prothonotariats," the office of procurator to the "camera;" every thing, in short, was sold under Sixtus IV, who carried this system to such an extent that he has frequently been called its founder, and indeed it was not completely organized until his time. A new college of twenty-six secretaries, with a complement of other officers, was founded by Innocent VIII for sixty thousand scudi; the embarrassments of this pontiff were such that he was compelled to give even the papal tiara as security. Alexander VI named eighty writers of briefs, each of whom paid seven hundred and fifty scudi for his place; Julius II added one hundred "writers of archives" at the same price.

Meanwhile the sources whence all these hundreds of officers drew their emoluments were not inexhaustible. We have seen how almost all Christian states made efforts, and very frequently successful efforts, to limit the encroachments of the papal court. This happened, too, precisely when the popes had been led into a vast expenditure by the magnitude of their undertakings.

This disposition of other countries made the circumstance of their obtaining so great an extension of their own territories extremely fortunate; for though their government was in the first instance very mild, they nevertheless drew large sums from these sources, and we cannot be surprised at finding this income administered in the same manner as the ecclesiastical funds.

¹ There were also Stradiotes and Mamelukes, who were, however, afterwards suppressed. "Adstipulatores, sine quibus nullae possent confici tabulae." Onuphrius Panvinus. According to the register (Uffici Antichi), this creation appears to have brought only 40,000 ducats.

When Julius II secured the salaries of the above-mentioned "writers," by an assignation on the annates, he added a further security charged on the customs and exchequer. He also instituted a college of one hundred and forty-one presidents of the Annona, all of whom were paid from the public chest; he made the surplus revenue of the country serve as a basis for contracting loans. The most distinguishing characteristic of this pope in the eyes of foreign powers was that he could raise what money he pleased; that was, in a certain measure, the foundation of his policy.

Still more urgent were the demands of Leo X than those of Julius had been; he was equally involved in war, was much less provident, and more dependent on the political aid of his family, which last required to be paid for. "That the pope should ever keep a thousand ducats together was a thing as impossible," says Francesco Vettori of this pontiff, "as that a stone should of its own will take to flying through the air." He has been reproached with having spent the revenues of three popes: that of his predecessor, from whom he inherited a considerable treasure, his own, and that of his successor, to whom he bequeathed a mass of debt. Not content with selling existing offices, his extraordinary nomination of cardinals brought him in important sums; and having once got on the beaten path of establishing offices for no other purpose than to sell them, he proceeded along it with the most pertinacious boldness. More than twelve hundred of these appointments were created by him alone,¹ the one point in which all these portionarii, scudieri, cavalieri di S. Pietro, and whatever other strange name they bore, agreed, was this, that all paid a sum of money for their offices, and drew the interest of it for life by virtue of these titles. Their appointment had no other signification. Some slight prerogative was sometimes conferred in addition to the interest. It was, in fact, a kind of life annuity; from such sales Leo is said to have drawn nine hundred thousand scudi.

¹ Sommario di la Relation di M. Minio, 1520. "Non ha contanti, perche è liberal, non sa tenir danari: poi li Fiorentini, (che) si fanno e sono soi parenti, non li lassa mai aver un soldo: e diti Fiorentini è in gran odio in corte, perche in ogni cosa è Fiorentini." [He never has ready money; he is too liberal, and cannot keep any; then the Florentines, who either are or pretend to be his relations, will not leave him a penny, and those Florentines are greatly detested at court, for in every man's business shall come the hand of a Florentine.]

The interest was indeed extremely high, amounting annually to an eighth of the capital,¹ which was to a certain extent provided for by a slight increase of ecclesiastical dues, but the larger portion came from the newly-conquered provinces. This latter part of the general sum proceeded, first from the surplus funds of the municipal administrations, which were paid into the coffers of the state, next from the alum works, and then from the salt trade. The remainder was supplied by the Roman custom-house. The number of saleable appointments was increased by Leo to two thousand one hundred and fifty, the annual income of which was estimated at three hundred and twenty thousand scudi, and was a burden both on Church and State.

But however blameable this prodigality might in itself have been, yet Leo was undoubtedly confirmed in it, by perceiving that for the time its effects were rather beneficial than injurious. If Rome at this period acquired so unusual an elevation and prosperity, it must be attributed principally to the monetary system we have described. In no city could the capitalist of that day invest his money to so much advantage; the number of new appointments, the vacancies and re-appointments, kept up a continual movement in the Curia; so that each man could easily find his opportunity for advancement.

By these operations the necessity for imposing new taxes was also avoided. The states of the Church were unquestionably less burdened with imposts at that moment than at any other; and Rome, as compared with other cities, was equally fortunate as to the amount of taxation. It had long before been represented to the Romans, that, whereas other cities were loaded by their lords with heavy loans and vexatious imposts, they on their part were rather made rich by their sovereign the pope. A secretary of Clement VII who wrote an account of the conclave by which that pontiff was elected, expresses his surprise that the Roman people were not more devoted to the holy see, the lightness of their burdens considered. "From Terracina to Piacenza," he exclaims, "the Church is in possession of a broad and fair portion of Italy, her dominion extends far and wide, yet all those flourishing lands and rich cities, which under any other sovereign would be burdened for the support of large armies, pay no more to the popes than just so much as will meet the expense of their own administration."¹

¹ The 612 portionarii di ripa—added to the college of presidents—paid 286,200 ducats, receiving yearly 38,816. The 400 cavaliers of St. Peter paid 400,000, and annually received 50,610 ducats.

But this state of things could last only, as is evident, so long as there was surplus money in the public coffers. Leo himself did not succeed in funding all his loans; he had borrowed thirty-two thousand scudi from Aluise Gaddi, and two hundred thousand from Bernardo Bini. Salviati, Ridolfi, and others of his servants and connections, had done their utmost to procure him money, their hopes of repayment and of future rewards were founded on his known liberality, and on his comparatively early years. By his sudden death they were all utterly ruined.

The financial operations of Leo X left his dominions in a state of exhaustion, the consequences of which were very soon felt by his successor.

The universal hatred drawn upon himself by the unlucky Adrian, was indeed caused in a great measure by the direct taxes he was compelled to impose. He found himself in the most urgent need, and laid a tax of half a ducat on each hearth;² this was not much, but was most unpopular with the Romans, to whom demands of this character were almost unknown.

¹ Vianesius Albergatus, Commentarii Rerum sui temporis (the description of the conclave rather): "opulentissimi populi et ditissimae urbes, quae, si alterius ditionis essent, suis vectigalibus vel magnos exercitus alere possent, Romano pontifici vix tantum tributum pendunt, quantum in praetorum magistratuumque expensam sufficere queat." In the Relation of Zorzi, 1517, the united revenues of Perugia, Spoleto, the Maich and Romagna, are set down at 120,000 ducats, after a calculation by Francesco Armellino. The half of this went into the papal treasury. "Di quel somma la mità è per terra per pagar i legati et altri officii, e altra mità ha il papa." Unfortunately there are numerous errors in the copy of this report as given by Sanuto.

² Hieronymo Negro a Marc Antonio Micheli, 7 April, 1523: Lettere di Principi, i. p. 114.

Neither could Clement VII avoid the imposition of new taxes; he chose indirect ones: yet much complaint arose against Cardinal Armellino, who was believed to have invented them. The increased duties levied at the city-gates, on articles of daily necessity, occasioned great dissatisfaction, but all were obliged to endure them.¹ Affairs were indeed in such a condition that much more important supplies than these were demanded, and could not be dispensed with.

Up to this time, loans had been raised under the form of saleable offices; an approximation to the system of direct loans was first made by Clement VII on the decisive occasion of his armament against Charles V in 1526.

In the former method, the capital was lost on the death of the purchaser, unless his family could make interest to recover it from the treasury; but Clement now raised a capital of two hundred thousand ducats, which did not yield so high an interest as the places, though still a large one, ten per cent. namely; but which continued the property of the heirs. This is a monte non vacabile, the monte della fede. The interest was charged on the customs, and was further secured by a provision that each creditor should receive a share in the direction of the dogana (customs). The old form was not, however, entirely abandoned, these monti being also incorporated as were colleges. There were certain contractors for the loan, who paid the sum required to the treasury, and then divided it in shares among the members of the college.

And now can we say that these creditors of the state, in so far as they had a lien on the general income, or the produce of the common labour, had also an indirect share in the government? It was certainly so understood in Rome, and without the form of such a participation, no man would lend his money.

¹ Foscari, Relatione, 1526: "E qualche murmuration in Roma etiam per causa del cardinal Armellin, qual truova nuove invention per trovar danari in Roma, e fa metter nove angarie, e fino chi porta tordi a Roma et altre cose di manzar paga tanto: la qual angaria importa da duc. 2500." [There is some murmuring in Rome, on account of Cardinal Armellino, who has devised new schemes for raising money: he has made new taxes, so that if a man do but bring a few thrushes or other eatables for sale, he must pay something: this tax brings in 2500 ducats.]

But this, as we shall see, was the commencement of widely extensive financial operations.

These were entered into with a certain moderation by Paul III. He contented himself with diminishing the interest of the monti established by Clement, and being successful in making new assignments of it, he increased the capital by nearly one half. He established no new monti, but for this moderation he was amply indemnified by the creation of six hundred new places. The measures by which this pontiff rendered himself memorable in the history of papal finance, were of a somewhat different character.

The commotions occasioned by his increase of the price of salt, we have already noticed. This source of income he relinquished; but in its stead he imposed the direct tax of the sussidio, solemnly promising, however, that it should not be permanent. It is this impost that was levied in so many of the southern states at that time. In Spain it was called the servicio, in Naples the donativo, in Milan the mensuale, and in other places it was known under different titles. It was originally introduced into the states of the Church for three years only, and was fixed at three hundred thousand scudi. The contribution of each province was determined in Rome; the provincial parliaments then assembled to divide this sum among the several towns, and the local governments again apportioned it between themselves, and the surrounding districts. No one was exempt. All the lay subjects of the Roman church, whatever their privileges and immunities, marquises, barons, feudal tenants, and public officers not excepted, are enjoined by the bull for this tax to contribute their share of the burden.¹

Payment was nevertheless not made without urgent remonstrance, more especially when it was found that this sussidio was continually renewed from one period of three years to another ; it was indeed never formally repealed, but neither was it ever perfectly collected.¹ Bologna had been rated at thirty thousand scudi, but her inhabitants had the foresight to compound for perpetual freedom from this impost by the payment of one large sum. Parma and Piacenza were alienated, and did not pay ; of what took place in other cities, that of Fano will afford us an example : this town refused for some time to pay the share apportioned to it, under pretext of being rated too highly, and Paul agreed for once to remit the arrears, but on condition that the full amount should be applied to repair the defences of the city. Subsequently too they were always allowed a third of their contribution for the same purpose. The descendants of these men nevertheless continued to declare that they were rated too highly ; the rural populations also uttered incessant outcries on the large share the towns imposed on their shoulders ; these last sought to emancipate themselves from the rule of the town-council ; and as this body asserted its supremacy, they would fain have had recourse to the protection of the duke of Urbino. But we should be led too far from our subject were we to pursue these local disputes into their details ; what we have said will suffice to explain the fact, that little more than half of the sum fixed on for the sussidio was ever realized.² In the year 1560, the whole proceeds did not surpass one hundred and sixty-five thousand scudi.

¹ Bullar. In the year 1537, he declares to the French ambassador, "la debilité du revenu de l'église [and consequently of the state], dont elle n'avoit point maintenant 40^m escus de rente par an de quoi elle puisse faire estat." In Ribier, i. 69.

But, notwithstanding all these things, the income of the Roman states was largely increased by this pontiff. Under Julius II the revenues were valued at 350,000 scudi ; under Leo, at 420,000 ; under Clement VII, in the year 1526, at 500,000 ; immediately after the death of Paul III, we gather, from authentic statements procured from the Roman treasury by the Venetian ambassador, Dandolo, that the amount had risen to 706,473 scudi.

¹ Bullar. Decens esse censemur : 5 Sept. 1543 : Bullar. Cocq. iv. i. 225.

² Bull of Paul IV : Cupientes Indemnitati : 15 April, 1559 : Bullar. Cocq. iv. i. 358 : "Exactio, causantibus diversis exceptionibus, libertatibus et immunitatibus a solutione ipsius subsidii diversis communitatibus et universitatibus et particularibus personis nec non civitatibus, terris, oppidis et locis nostri status ecclesiastici concessis, et factis diversarum portionum ejusdem subsidii donationibus seu remissionibus, vix ad dimidium summae trecentorum millium scutorum hujusmodi ascendit."

His successors were, nevertheless, but slightly benefited by this rise. Julius III, in one of his instructions, complains that his predecessor had alienated the entire revenue. He must certainly have meant to except the subsidy, which being, nominally at least, to be paid but for three years, could not of course be alienated; but he furthermore bewails, that a floating debt of 500,000 scudi had also been bequeathed to him by the same pontiff.¹

But as Julius III was not withheld by this state of his affairs from plunging into a war with the French and the Farnesi, the utmost embarrassment was inevitable, whether for himself or the state. The imperialists paid him what, for those times, was a very large sum; but his letters are, nevertheless, filled with complaints. "He had hoped to receive 100,000 scudi from Ancona, and has not received 100,000 bajocchi. Instead of 120,000 scudi from Bologna he has had 50,000 only. The money-changers of Genoa and Lucca had made promises, but had withdrawn them before they were well spoken. Whoever possessed a groat (carline) kept it safe in his fingers, and would hear nothing of speculating with it."²

The pope, desiring to keep an army on foot, was compelled to the adoption of more effectual measures, and resolved on founding a new monte. The manner in which he proceeded on this occasion became the model which has been almost invariably pursued in later times.

A new impost of two carlines was laid on every rubbio of flour, and this produced him, when all deductions had been made, the sum of 30,000 scudi, which was appropriated to the payment of interest on a capital raised forthwith: thus did he originate the monte della farina. It will be remarked, that this operation is closely analogous to the measures of finance adopted in earlier times. Now ecclesiastical offices had on previous occasions been created, and their salaries made payable on the increasing revenues of the curia, merely that they might be sold to procure the sum required by the demand of the moment. On this occasion the revenues of the state were increased by a new tax; but this was employed solely as interest for a large capital that could not otherwise have been raised. This practice has been continued by all succeeding pontiffs. These monti were sometimes "non vacabili," like the Clementine; at other times they were "vacabili," the interest ceasing, that is, on the death of the lender, but then the per-centage was much higher, and the collegiate character of the monte brought the plan nearer to that of saleable offices. Paul IV established the monte novennale de' frati, founding it on a tax which he imposed on the regular monastic orders. Pius IV levied half a farthing (a quattrino) on every pound of meat, applying the produce to the foundation of the monte pio non vacabile, which brought him in about 170,000 scudi. Pius V added a second quattrino on the pound of meat, and on this he established the monte lega.

¹ Istruttione per voi Monsignore d'Imola, ultimo di Marzo, 1551; Inform. Polit. tom. xii.

² Il Papa, a Giovamb. di Monte, 2 April, 1552.

The general importance of the Roman states becomes intelligible to our perceptions in proportion as we keep the development of this system clearly in view: by what class of necessities were the popes compelled to a mode of raising loans that burdened their territories with so direct a weight of imposts? We reply, that these necessities arose chiefly from the demands of Catholicism. The time had passed by when the purposes of the popes could be purely political; those of an ecclesiastical character could alone be now attempted, with any hope of success. The desire to come to the aid of Catholic sovereigns, in their struggles with the Protestants, or in their undertakings against the Turks, was now almost invariably the immediate inducement to new financial operations. The monte lega received that name from Pius V, because the capital derived from it was applied to the war against the Turks, undertaken by that pontiff in his "league" with Spain and Venice. This becomes ever more and more observable; the papal states were affected in their finances by almost every commotion arising in Europe. There were few of these occasions when the popes could escape the necessity of exacting new efforts from their own subjects for the maintenance of ecclesiastical interests. Thus was the possession of extensive dominions of vital importance to the ecclesiastical prosperity of the popes.

Not that they were content with the produce of their "monti;" they still continued the former practices. New offices, or "cavaliere," were still created, with more or less of privilege attached; whether it was that the salaries were provided for as before, by new imposts, or that the depression which then took place in the value of money caused larger amounts to be paid into the treasury.¹

It resulted from this, that the revenues of the papacy, excepting only a short period of diminution, occasioned by the war under Paul IV, were continually rising in nominal value; even during his life they increased again to 700,000 scudi. Under Pius they were estimated at 898,482 scudi. Paolo Tiepolo is surprised to find them, after an absence of five years, augmented by 200,000 scudi, and risen to an amount of 1,100,000 scudi. Yet the popes did not, in effect, receive a larger income. This, though an extraordinary circumstance, was yet a necessary consequence of the system; for, as the taxes increased so did the alienations. Julius III is said to have alienated 54,000; Paul IV, 45,960; and Pius IV, who found all means good that gave him money, is calculated to have disposed of 182,550 scudi. This latter pontiff increased the number of saleable offices to 3,500, and this did not include the monti, which were not considered to belong to the offices.² He raised the amount of the alienated funds to 450,000 scudi, and this now increased continually. In the year 1576 it was 530,000 scudi; the increase of the revenue had been also large, but the half of its total amount was, nevertheless, absorbed by these alienations.³ The registers of the papal revenues present an extraordinary aspect in these times. The contracts made with the farmers of the revenue were generally for a period of nine years ; after specifying, article by article, the sums these men had agreed to pay, the registers also state what portion of each is alienated. In 1576, and the following years, the Roman customs, for example, brought in the considerable amount of 133,000 scudi, but of this 111,170 were alienated ; other deductions having also to be made, the treasury received in effect 13,000 only. There were some taxes, as on corn, meat, and wine, of which the whole were swallowed up by the monti. From many provincial chests, called treasuries, which had also to provide for the exigencies of the provinces, not one sixpence reached the papal coffers ; the March and Camerino may serve as examples of this fact, yet the "sussidio" was often applied to the same purpose ; nay, so heavy were the incumbrances laid on the alum-works of Tolfa, which had usually been a valuable source of income, that their accounts displayed a deficiency of 2,000 scudi.¹

¹ Thus about 1580, many of these "luoghi di monte" stood at 100, instead of 130: the interest of the "vacabili" was reduced from 14 to 9, so that, on the whole, a great saving was effected.

² Lista degli Uffici della Corte Romana, 1560: Bibl. Chigi, N. ii. 50. Many other separate lists of different years.

³ Tiepolo calculates, that in addition to 100,000 scudi for salaries, 270,000 were expended on fortifications and offices of legates; the pope had 200,000 left. He tells us, that of 1,800,000 received under pretext of the Turkish war, 340,000 only were applied to that purpose.

The personal expenses of the pontiff and those of his court, were principally charged on the dataria, which had two distinct sources of income ; the one was more strictly ecclesiastical, as arising from compositions, fixed payments, for which the datary permitted "regresses," "reservations," and various other clerical irregularities, in the course of translation from one benefice to another. The rigid severity of Paul IV had greatly diminished this source of profit, but its value was gradually restored. The other part of the dataria's income proceeded from the appointments to vacant "cavaliere," saleable offices, and places in the "monti vacabili," it increased as the number of these appointments was augmented, and was, as is obvious, of a more secular nature than the portion first described.² About the year 1570, however, both united did but just suffice to meet the daily expenses of the papal household.

¹ For example : Entrata della Reverenda Camera Apostolica sotto il Pontificato di N. S. Gregorio XIII, fata nell' Anno 1576. MS. Gothana, No. 219.

² According to Mocenigo, 1560, the dataria had at one time yielded between 10,000 and 14,000 ducats per month. Under Paul IV the proceeds fell to 3,000 or 4,000 ducats.

The position of things had become greatly changed by these financial proceedings of the Roman state, which, from having been famed as the least burdened in Italy, was now more heavily taxed than most of them.¹ Loud complaints were heard from all quarters; of the ancient municipal independence scarcely anything remained; the administration gradually became more uniform. In former times the rights of government had frequently been ceded to some favourite cardinal, or other prelate, who made no inconsiderable profit from them. The compatriots of popes, as, for example, the Florentines under the Medici, the Neapolitans under Paul IV, and the Milanese under Pius IV, had in turn held possession of the best places. Pius V put an end to this practice. The governments thus committed to favourites had not been administered by them, but had always been deputed to some doctor of laws, chosen for that purpose;² these doctors, Pius V himself appointed, appropriating to the treasury those advantages that had previously accrued to the favourites. Every thing proceeded more tranquilly and with better order; in earlier times a militia had been established, and sixteen thousand men enrolled. Pius IV had besides maintained a body of light cavalry. Pius V dispensed with both; the cavalry he disbanded, and suffered the militia to fall into disuse; his whole armed force amounted to less than five hundred men, of whom three hundred and fifty, principally Swiss, were in

¹ Paolo Tiepolo, Relatione di Roma in tempo di Pio IV e Pio V, already remarks: "L'imposizione allo stato ecclesiastico è gravezza quasi insopportabile per essere per diversi altri conti molto aggravato; — d'alienare più entrate della chiesa non vi è più ordine, perché quasi tutte l'entrate certe si trovano già alienate e sopra l'incerto non si trovaria chi desse danari." [The incumbrances of the papal states are nearly insupportable, being aggravated by various causes; no further alienation of Church revenues is possible; for all certain sources are already alienated, and no one would advance money on those that are uncertain.]

² Tiepolo, ibid. "Qualche governo o legatione rispondeva sino a tre, quatro o forse sette mila e più scudi l'anno. E quasi tutti allegramente ricevendo il denaro si scaricavano del peso del governo col mettere un dottore in luogo loro." [Some legations or governments were valued at 3,000, 4,000, or perhaps 7,000 or more scudi per annum; but almost all those appointed to them were glad to receive the money, and made a doctor perform the duties in their stead.]

Rome. Had there not been still some need of protection along the coast from the incursions of the Turks, the people might have forgotten the use of arms. This population, once so warlike, seemed now disposed to live in undisturbed peace. The popes desired to rule their territory like a large domain, applying a certain portion of its rents to the expenses of their household, but disposing of the largest part in the service of the Church exclusively.

In the pursuit of this design also, we shall see that they encountered no slight difficulty.

THE TIMES OF GREGORY XIII AND SIXTUS V

3. GREGORY XIII

Gregory XIII, Hugo Buoncompagno of Bologna, who had raised himself to eminence as a jurist and in the civil service, was cheerful and lively in disposition. He had never married, but before the assumption of any clerical dignity, he had a son born to him, of whom we shall hear further. Later in life his habits became serious and regular; not that he was at any time particularly scrupulous; on the contrary, he displayed a certain dislike of all sanctimonious acerbity, and seemed more disposed to take Pius IV as an example than his more immediate predecessor.¹ But in this pontiff was exemplified the force of public opinion; a hundred years earlier, he would have governed at the most as did Innocent VIII. It was now on the contrary made obvious, that even a man of his dispositions could no longer resist the rigidly ecclesiastical tendency of the times.

This tendency was maintained by a party in the court, whose first object was to prevent it from declining. Jesuits, Theatines, and their adherents, were its members; those more conspicuously active were Monsignori Frumento and

¹ His reign was expected to be different from that of his predecessor: "mitiori quadam hominumque captui accommodatori ratione." Commentarii de rebus Gregorii XIII. (MS. Bibl. Alb.)

Corniglia, with the bold and fearless preacher Francesco Toledo, and the datary Contarelli. Their influence over the pope was acquired all the more readily and preserved the more securely, from the fact that they all acted in concert. They represented to him that the high consideration enjoyed by his predecessor, had arisen principally from the severity of his personal character and conduct; in all the letters that they read aloud to him, the memory of Paul's holy life and virtues, with the fame of his reforms, was the subject principally dwelt on; whatever was not to this effect they passed over. By thus proceeding, they gave to the ambition of Gregory XIII a character most thoroughly spiritual.¹

He had it greatly at heart to promote the son we have mentioned, and to raise him to princely dignity. But at the first act of favour he showed him, naming him castellan of St. Angelo and gonfaloniere of the Church, these rigorous counsellors alarmed the conscience of the pope; and during the jubilee of 1575, they would not permit him to suffer the presence of Giacomo (his son) in Rome. When this was over, they did indeed allow him to return, but only because the disappointment of the aspiring young man was injuriously affecting his health. Gregory then caused him to marry, and induced the republic of Venice to enrol him among its nobili,² he also prevailed on the king of Spain to

¹ Relatione della corte di Roma a tempo di Gregorio XIII. (Bibl. Corsini, 714,) 20 Feb. 1574, is full of instruction on this subject. Of the pope's character, the author says, "non è stato scrupoloso nè dissoluto mai e le son dispiaciute le cose mal fatte" [he has never been either scrupulous or dissolute, and regards all misconduct with displeasure.]

² They were not a little puzzled for a description of his origin on this occasion, and it is thought creditable to Venetian address, that he was called simply "Signor Boncompagno, nearly related to his holiness." The evasion was invented by Cardinal Como. The affair being in discussion, the ambassador asked the minister if Giacomo should be called the son of his holiness. "S. Sg^{ra} Ill^{ma} prontamente, dopo avere scusato con molte parole il fatto di S. S^a, che prima che avesse alcuno ordine ecclesiastico generasse questo figliuolo, disse: che si potrebbe nominarlo per il S^r Jacomo Boncompagno, Bolognese strettamente congiunto con Sua Santità." [His excellency then making many excuses for his holiness, to whom this son was born before he had taken orders, suggested that the youth might be called nominate him general of his hommes d'armes, not, however, relaxing the close restraint in which he held him. But on a certain occasion the young man attempted the liberation of a college friend who had been arrested, when his father again sent him into exile, and was about to deprive him of all his offices; this was prevented only by his young wife, who threw herself at the pontiff's feet, and at length obtained her husband's pardon. The time for more ambitious hopes was, however, long since past.¹ Giacomo Buoncompagno had never any very serious influence with his father until the life of the latter was drawing to a close, nor even then was it unlimited in state affairs of moment.² If any one requested his intercession in these matters, his reply was to shrug his shoulders, as one who would say, "how hopeless is the case!"

Being thus rigid in regard to his son, it will be manifest that he was little likely to favour more distant relations. It is true that he did raise two of his nephews to the cardinalate (and Pius V had done as much), but when a third, encouraged by their promotion, came to court with hope of equal fortune, he was refused an audience, and commanded to quit Rome within two days. The brother of Gregory had left his home, and was on the road to see and enjoy the honour that had visited his family, but on arriving at Orvieto, he was met by a papal messenger, who desired him to return. Tears rose to the old man's eyes, and he was tempted to go yet a little further towards Rome; but, receiving a second intimation to desist, he obeyed it and returned to Bologna.³

These things suffice to shew that this pontiff is not

"Sr. Jacomo Boncompagno of Bologna, closely connected with his holiness."] Dispaccio Paolo Tiepolo 3 Marzo 1574.

¹ Antonio Tiepolo, Dispacci, Agosto, Sett. 1576. In the year 1583, 29 March, one of these papers remarks, "il Signor Giacomo non si lascia intrromettere in cose di stato."

² It is only in the latter part of the life of Gregory that this opinion of him is correct; it has, however, taken firm hold, and I find it again, for example, in the Memoirs of Richelieu: "prince doux et benin fut meilleur homme que bon pape." It will be seen that this was only very partially true.

³ The good man complained that the election of his brother was more injurious than useful to him, since it compelled him to an expenditure which was beyond the allowance that Gregory granted him.

chargeable with nepotism, or the advancement of his own family to the offence of the laws. On one occasion, when a newly appointed cardinal declared that he should be ever grateful "to the family and nephews of his holiness," Gregory struck the arms of the chair he sat on with both hands, exclaiming, "Be thankful rather to God, and to the Holy See!"

To this extent was he already influenced by the serious tendency of the time. Not only did he seek to equal the piety of demeanour¹ so lauded in Pius V, he even desired to surpass it; in the early years of his pontificate he said mass three times a week, never omitting to do so on Sundays: his life and deportment were not only irreproachable but even exemplary.

There were certain duties of the papal office that no pontiff ever performed with more zeal and propriety than Gregory XIII. He had a list of all those men, of whatever country, who were suited for the office of bishop; evinced an accurate knowledge of the character and qualifications of all who were proposed to his acceptance, and exercised the most anxious care in the nomination to these important offices.

His most earnest endeavours were especially given to securing a strict system of ecclesiastical education. His liberality in assisting the progress of Jesuit colleges was almost without bounds. He made rich presents to the house of the "professed" in Rome, caused whole streets to be closed up, purchased many buildings, and assigned a large income, to aid the completion of the college in that form which we see it bear even to our days. Twenty lecture-rooms, with three hundred and sixty cells for students, are enumerated in this building, which was called "the Seminary of all Nations." Even on its first foundation, measures were taken to make it clear that this college was meant to embrace the whole world,—twenty-five speeches being pronounced in as many different languages, each accompanied by a Latin interpretation.¹ The Collegium Germanicum, which had been founded some years before, was falling into decay from want of means; to this, also, Gregory gave a palace, that of S. Apollinare, and added the revenues of S. Stefano on Monte Celio, together with the sum of ten thousand scudi, charged on the Camera Apostolica. He may indeed be regarded as the true founder of this institution, whence, year after year since his time, a whole host of champions for the Catholic faith has been poured into Germany. He found means to erect and endow an English college in Rome; he assisted those of Vienna and Grätz from his private purse; and there was not, perhaps, a single Jesuit school in the world which he did not in some way contribute to support. Following the counsels of the bishop of Sitia, he also established a Greek college, into which boys from thirteen to sixteen were admitted. And not only were they received from countries already under Christian rule, as Corfu and Candia, but also from Constantinople, Salonica, and the Morea. They had Greek instructors, and were clothed in the kaftan and Venetian baret; they were upheld in all Greek customs, and never permitted to forget that it was in their native country they were preparing to act.² They retained their own rites as well as language, and their religious education was conducted according to those doctrines of the council, and in those principles, whereon the Greek and Latin churches were of one accord.

¹ Seconda Relatione dell' Ambasciatore di Roma C^{lmo}. M. Paolo Tiepolo, Cav^{re}, 3 Maggio, 1576: "Nella religione ha tolto non solo d'imitar, ma ancora d'avanzar Pio V: dice per l'ordinario almeno tre volte messa alla settimana. Ha avuto particolar cura delle chiese, facendole non solo con fabriche et altri modi ornar, ma ancora colla assistentia e frequentia di preti accrescer nel culto divino."

The reform of the calendar, accomplished by Pope Gregory XIII, was another proof of the assiduous care which he extended over the whole Catholic world. This had been greatly desired by the council of Trent, and it was rendered imperatively necessary by the displacement of the high festivals of the Church from the relation to particular seasons of the year which had been imposed on them by the decrees of councils. All Catholic nations took part in this reform.

A Calabrian, else little known, Luigi Lilio, has gained

¹ Dispaccio Donato, 13 Genn. 1582.

² Dispaccio Antonio Tiepolo, 16 Marzo, 1577: "Accio che fatto maggiori possano affettionatamente e con la verità imparata dar a vedere ai suoi Greci la vera via."

himself immortal renown by the suggestion of the most efficient method for overcoming the difficulty. All the universities, among them the Spanish,—those of Salamanca and Alcalá,—were consulted as to his proposed plan; favourable opinions came from all quarters. A commission was then appointed in Rome (its most active and learned member being the German Clavius).¹ By this body it was minutely examined and finally decided on. The learned Cardinal Sirleto had exercised the most important influence over the whole affair; it was conducted with a certain degree of mystery, the calendar being concealed from all, even from the ambassadors, until it had received the approval of the different courts;² Gregory then proclaimed it with great solemnity, vaunting this reform as a proof of God's illimitable grace towards his Church.³

The labours of this pontiff were, however, not always of so peaceable a character: could he have decided the question, that "league" by which the battle of Lepanto had been gained would never have been dissolved; and it was a source of grief to him when the Venetians made peace with the Turks, and when Philip of Spain afterwards agreed to a truce with them. A wide field was afforded to his exertions by the disturbances in France and the Netherlands, as also by the collision of parties in Germany. He was inexhaustible in expedients for the destruction of Protestantism; and the insurrections that Elizabeth had to contend with in Ireland were almost all excited or encouraged by Rome. The pope made no secret of his desire to bring about a general combination against England: year after year was this subject pressed by his nuncios on Philip II and the house of Guise. A connected history of all these labours and projects would be no uninteresting occupation for him who should undertake it; they were for the most part unknown to those whose destruction they were intended to accomplish, but did at length produce the great

¹ Erythraeus: "in quibus Christophorus Clavius principem locum obtinebat."

² Dispaccio Donato, 20 Dec. 1581; 2 Giugno, 1582. He praises the cardinal as "huomo veramente di grande letteratura."

³ Bull of the 13th Feb. 1582, § 12.—Bullar. Cocq. iv. 4, 10, enterprise of the Armada. With the most eager zeal were all the proceedings forwarded by Gregory, and it was to his connection with the Guises that the French league, so dangerous to Henry III and IV, is indebted for its origin.

We have seen that this pontiff did not load the state too heavily for the benefit of his family, as so many of his predecessors had done, but the comprehensive and costly works in which he constantly engaged compelled him to lay his hand with equal weight on the public revenues. Even for the expedition of Stukeley, which terminated so unhappily in Africa, insignificant as it was, he expended a very large sum. To Charles IX he once sent four hundred thousand ducats, the proceeds of a direct impost levied on the towns of the Roman states; he also frequently aided the emperor and the grand-master of Malta with sums of money. His pacific enterprises equally demanded extensive funds: he is computed to have spent two millions on the support of young men in the pursuit of their studies.¹ How heavy, then, must needs have been the cost of those twenty-two Jesuit colleges which owed their origin to his munificence.

When we consider the financial condition of the state, which, in spite of its increasing income, had never presented a disposable surplus, it becomes obvious that he must often have suffered considerable embarrassment.

The Venetians attempted to persuade him into granting them a loan very soon after his accession to the see. Gregory listened to the representations of the ambassador with increasing attention; but having arrived at the drift of his proposals, he at once interrupted him. "What do I hear, my lord ambassador?" he exclaimed; "the congregation sits every day to devise means of raising money, but never does one man among them contrive any available expedient for doing so."²

¹ Calculation of Baronius. Possevinus in Ciacconius, Vitae Pontificum, iv. 37. Lorenzo Priuli calculates that he spent 200,000 scudi annually on "opere pie." On this subject the extracts given by Cocquelinus at the close of Maffei's Annals, from the report of cardinals Como and Musotti, are most authentic and copious.

² Dispaccio, 14 Marzo, 1573: It is a "Congregatione deputata sopra la provisione di danari."

The mode in which Gregory should administer the resources of the state was now a question of paramount importance. The evil of alienations had at length become clearly apparent to all; new imposts were considered impolitic and highly censured,—the doubtful, nay, the pernicious consequences of such a system were clearly perceived and fully appreciated. Gregory imposed on the congregation the task of procuring him money, but they were to make no ecclesiastical concessions, lay on no new taxes, and permit the sale of no Church revenues.

How, then, were they to proceed? The means devised, in reply to this question, were sufficiently remarkable, as were also the results eventually produced by them.

Gregory XIII was not to be restrained from the pursuit of what he considered a right, and he believed himself to have discovered that many prerogatives of the ecclesiastical principality yet remained to be put in force; these, he thought, had only to be asserted in order to supply him with new sources of income.¹ It was not in his character to respect the privileges that might stand in his way: thus, among others, he abolished, without hesitation, that possessed by the Venetians, of exporting corn from the March and Ravenna, under certain favourable conditions, declaring that it was fair to make foreigners pay equal duty with the natives.² Since the Venetians did not instantly comply, he caused their magazines in Ravenna to be opened by force, the contents to be sold by auction, and the owners imprisoned. This was but a small affair, it is true, but served to intimate the path he intended to pursue. His next step was of much more lasting importance: believing that a crowd of abuses existed among the possessions of the aristocracy in his own territories, he decided that the reform of these would be highly beneficial to his treasury. His secretary of the "camera," Rudolfo Bonfigliuolo, proposed a comprehensive renewal and extension of feudal rights, which had hitherto scarcely been thought of; he affirmed that a large part of the estates and castles held by the barons of the state had lapsed to the sovereign, either by failure in the direct line of succession, or because the dues to which they were liable had not been paid.¹ The pope had already acquired some domains that had either lapsed or were purchased, and nothing could be more agreeable to him than to continue doing so. He at once set earnestly to work. From the Isei of Cesena he wrested Castelnuovo in the hills of Romagna, and from the Sassatelli of Imola he gained Corcana. Lonzano, seated on its beautiful hill, and Savignano in the plain, were taken from the Rangoni of Modena. Alberto Pio resigned Bertinoro, to escape the suit with which the treasury threatened him; but this did not suffice, and he was divested of Verucchio and other places. Seeing this, he tendered his arrears of rent on every festival of St. Peter, but they were never afterwards accepted. All this occurred in Romagna alone, and the other provinces did not fare better. It was not only to estates on which the feudal services remained unpaid that the court asserted a claim, there were other domains which had originally been mortgaged to certain barons, but this so long since that the mode of their tenure had been forgotten; the property had descended from hand to hand as freehold, and had often largely increased in value. The pope and his secretaries now chose to redeem the mortgages; in this manner they gained possession of Sitiano, a castle that had been pledged for 14,000 scudi; that sum they laid down, but it was greatly below the value of the property, which, being considered freehold, had received extensive improvement.²

¹ Maffei: Annali di Gregorio XIII, i. p. 104. He calculates that the States of the Church had a clear income of 160,000 scudi only.

² Dispaccio Antonio Tiepolo, 12 April, 1577.

¹ Dispaccio A. Tiepolo 12 Genn. 1579: "Il commissario della camera attende con molta diligentia a ritrovare e rivedere scritture per ricuperare quanto dalli pontefici passati si è stato obligato o dato in pegno ad alcuno, e vedendo che S. S.^a gli assentisse volentieri, non la spaiagna o porta rispetto ad alcuno."

² Elencus omnium locorum, bonorum et possessionum, quae olim a Romanis pontificibus in feudum concessa et a Gregorio PP. XIII sive extinctione investiturae, sive alia transactione recuperata et acquisita fuere, ab eoque camerae apostolicae incorporata, a Tydeo de Marchis, ejusdem camerae notario et archivi illius custode, jussu Gregorii XIII confectus, adjectis a nobis vero rescissis singularum recuperationum ac acquisitionum instrumentis. See Theiner, Codex diplomaticus domini temporalis S. Sedis, t. III, p. 547.

Gregory congratulated himself continually on these proceedings ; he believed he had established a new claim to the favour of heaven with every addition, were it only of ten scudi, that he succeeded in adding to the income of the Church, provided it were done without new imposts. He calculated with infinite pleasure that he should soon have made an addition of one hundred thousand scudi to the revenues of the state, and all by legitimate proceedings. How greatly would his means for proceeding against infidels and heretics be thus increased ! His measures were, for the most part, much approved by the court. "This pope is called the 'vigilant'" (Gregorius signifies vigilant), says the cardinal of Como; "by his vigilance will he recover his own."¹ But the feeling of the provinces on this subject was altogether different from that of the court ; the impression produced on the aristocracy was most unfavourable.

Estates that had long been considered their own, and held by the most legitimate claims, were now torn from the best families of the land ; a like calamity was impending over others, daily search among old papers was made in Rome, new claims were continually founded on them, no man could believe himself secure, and many resolved to defend their property by force of arms, rather than resign it to the commissioners of the treasurer. One of these feudal tenants told Gregory to his face, "If a thing is lost, it is lost ; but there is always a satisfaction in arming oneself for the defence of one's own."

But from all this there arose the most violent fermentation ; the influence of the barons on the peasantry and on the nobili of the neighbouring towns awakened extreme indignation throughout the country at the pontiff's new measures.

In addition to these unpopular proceedings, came the fact that certain towns had suffered heavy losses by other injudicious expedients of the pope. He had, for example, raised the port-dues of Ancona, believing that these would fall, not upon the country, but the foreign merchants. An injury was nevertheless inflicted on that city from which it has never recovered. Its commerce suddenly departed, nor could the removal of the obnoxious impost avail to bring it back ; even the restoration of their ancient privileges to the Ragusans did not suffice to make up the loss.

¹ Dispaccio, 21 Ott. 1581 : "Sono molti anni che la chiesa non ha havuto pontefice di questo nome Gregorio, che secundo la sua etimologia greca vuol dire vigilante : questo che è Gregorio è vigilante, vuol vigilare e ricuperare il suo, e li par di far un gran servitio, quando ricupera alcuna cosa, benche minima."

Equally unexpected and peculiar were the consequences that ensued from the policy that Gregory had adopted.

In all countries (but more especially in one of so pacific a character as that now displayed by the papal states) obedience to the government is based on voluntary subordination. In the Roman territories, the elements of dissension were neither destroyed nor removed, they were simply concealed by the mantle of authority extending over them ; accordingly, the principle of subordination being disturbed on one point, these all pressed forward together and burst into open conflict. The land seemed suddenly to remember how warlike, how well skilled in arms, and how unfettered in its parties it had remained for whole centuries. It began to feel contempt for this government of priests and men of law, and returned to the condition most natural to it.

It is true that no direct opposition was offered to the government, no general revolt ensued : but the old feuds reappeared in every part of the country.

Once again was the whole of Romagna divided by these factions ; in Ravenna the Rasponi and the Leonardi were arrayed against each other ; in Rimini, the Ricciardelli and the Tignoli ; in Cesena, the Venturelli and the Bottini ; in Forlì, the Numai and the Sirugli ; in Imola, the Vicini and the Sassatelli. The first-named of these families were Ghibellines, the others Guelphs ; however completely the interests originally connected with these appellations had altered, the names still survived. These parties often held possession of different quarters of the city, and different churches ; they were distinguished by slight signs, as, for example, that the Guelph wore the feather on the right side of his hat, the Ghibelline on the left.¹ These divisions reigned even in the smallest villages ; a man would not have spared the life of his brother, had he belonged to the opposite faction ; and some were known who had destroyed their wives, that they might be at liberty to marry into families of their own party. In these disorders, the Pacifici could avail nothing ; and their influence was all the more completely lost, from the fact that favouritism had placed unsuitable members among their body. The factions took the administration of justice into their own hands ; certain persons, who had been condemned by the tribunals, they declared innocent, and liberated them by breaking open their prisons ; their enemies, on the contrary, they sought in the same place and by the same means, but it was to place their heads around the fountains, where, on the day following their capture, they were frequently to be seen.¹

¹ The Relatione della Romagna describes the difference as existing "nel tagliar del pane, nel cingersi, in portare il pennacchio, fiocco o

Public authority being thus enfeebled, troops of bandits assembled in the March, the Campagna, and indeed all the provinces ; these outlaws very soon amounting to small armies.

At the head of these bands were Alfonso Piccolomini, Roberto Malatesta, and other young men of the most illustrious families ; Piccolomini seized the town-hall of Monte Abbondo, had all his enemies hunted out, and put them to death before the eyes of their mothers and wives ; nine of the name of Gabuzio were thus destroyed, Piccolomini's followers dancing in the market-place while the execution was proceeding. He marched through the country as lord of the land : an attack of ague seized him, but was not suffered to impede his progress ; while the fever was on him, he caused himself to be carried in a litter at the head of his troops. He sent a message to the inhabitants of Corneto, advising them to make good speed with their harvest, because he meant himself to come and burn the crops of his enemy Latino Orsini. In his personal conduct, Piccolomini affected to deal with a certain sort of honour ; fiove al capello o all' orecchio " [in the cutting of their clothes, mode of wearing the belt, the feather, tassel, or flower worn on the cap or at the ear].

¹ In the MS. Sixtus V Pontifex Max. (Altieri Library in Rome), this state of things is minutely described. (See App. No. 52.)

he would take the letters of a courier, but the gold borne by him would remain untouched ; to the rapacious brutality of his followers, however, he set no bounds ; from all sides messengers were sent by the different cities to Rome, entreating protection.¹ The pope increased his military forces, and invested Cardinal Sforza with powers for the repression of this violence, surpassing any that had ever been conferred since the time of Cardinal Albornoz. Not only was he empowered to proceed without respect to privileges, by whomever or however possessed ; but he was also at liberty to act without regard to any forms of law, without even the ceremony of a trial, manu regiâ.² Giacomo Buoncompagno took the field, and they did certainly succeed in dispersing these bands, and in clearing the country ; but no sooner were their backs turned, than the outlaws instantly sprang up as actively as ever in their rear, and all the previous disorders recommenced.

That these evils should thus become incurable, is attributable to a particular circumstance that must be related.

Pope Gregory XIII, who is so frequently described as good-natured to excess, had yet asserted his ecclesiastical as well as secular rights with extremity of rigour,³ and in doing

¹ Dispacchi Donato, of 1582, throughout.

² Brief for Sforza, given in the Dispacchi : "Omnimodam facultatem, potestatem, auctoritatem et arbitrium contra quoscunque bannitos, facinorosos, receptatores, fautores, complices et sequaces etc. nec non contra communitates, universitates et civitates, terras et castra et alios cujuscunque dignitatis vel praeeminentiae, Barones, Duces et quavis auctoritate fungentes, et extrajudicialiter et juris ordine non servato, etiam sine processu et scripturis, et manu regia illosque omnes et singulos puniendi tam in rebus et bonis quam in personis."

³ So early as 1576, Paolo Tiepolo remarks this : "Quanto piu cerca d'acquistarsi nome di giusto, tanto piu lo perde di grätioso, perche concede molto meno gratie straordinarie di quel che ha fatto altro pontefice di molti anni in qua : — la qual cosa, aggiunta al mancamento ch'è in lui di certi officii grati et accetti per la difficultà massimamente naturale che ha nel parlar e per le pochissime parole che in ciascuna occasione usa, fa ch'egli in gran parte manca di quella gratia appresso le persone." [The more he seeks to acquire the name of a just man, the less is he likely to retain that of a gracious prince, conferring fewer special favours than any pontiff for many years past ; besides this, he does not succeed in winning those around him, partly because he has a natural incapacity for expressing himself, and because of the very

this he regarded no man's interest or feelings. He spared neither the emperor nor the king of Spain, and to his more immediate neighbours he shewed as little deference. With Venice he was involved in disputes interminable; some regarded the affair of Aquileia, some the visitation of their churches, and various other points. The ambassadors could find no words to describe the heat with which he spoke of these matters, the acerbity that he displayed on their being even alluded to. With Tuscany and Naples affairs were not more peaceably arranged, nor did Ferrara find greater favour. Parma had but lately lost large sums of money in legal disputes with the pontiff. It thus happened that all his neighbours exulted at seeing the pope involved in perplexities so painful, and gave a ready asylum to his outlaws, who took the first opportunity of returning to their country. It was in vain that Gregory entreated them to discontinue this connivance; they chose to consider it extraordinary that Rome should treat all other states with indifference and contempt, but should nevertheless set up a claim to service and respect at the hands of all.¹

Thus it came to pass that Gregory could never make himself master of these bandits. The taxes remained unpaid, and the sussidio could not be collected; a feeling of discontent took possession of the whole country; even cardinals were mooted the question whether it would not be advisable to attach themselves to some other state.

The further prosecution of the measures suggested by the secretary of the "camera" was out of the question in this position of things; in December, 1581, the Venetian ambassador made it publicly known that his holiness had commanded the discontinuance of all proceedings in the confiscation of lands.

Perhaps even more painful was the necessity to which the pontiff was also reduced, of permitting Piccolomini to few words he uses on all occasions,—thus he gains but little personal attachment.]

¹ Dispaccio Donato, 10 Sett. 1581: "E una cosa grande che con non dar mai satisfactione nissuna si pretende d'avere da altri in quello che tocca alla libertà dello stato suo correntemente ogni sorte d'ossequio."

appear in the capital, and present a petition for pardon.¹ A deep shudder passed over him as he read the long list of murders and other atrocities that he was called on to forgive, and he laid the paper on the table; but he was assured that one of three things must happen; either his son Giacomo would receive his death from the hand of Piccolomini, or he must himself condemn Piccolomini to death, or resolve on granting him a pardon. The father confessors of St. John Lateran declared, that though they dared not violate the secrets of the confessional, yet thus much they were permitted to say, a great calamity was impending, and unless something were speedily done, would inevitably ensue: Piccolomini was besides publicly favoured by the grand duke of Tuscany, and was at that moment lodged in the Medici palace. Seeing all these things, the pontiff at last submitted, but with a deeply mortified spirit, and the brief of absolution received his signature.

This did not, however, suffice to restore tranquillity to the country; his own capital was filled with the outlaws, and matters got to such a pass that the city magistracy of the conservators was compelled to assist the papal police, which could not secure obedience. A pardon being offered to a certain bandit called Marianazzo, he refused it, declaring that his life "was more secure while remaining an outlaw, to say nothing of the increased advantage!"²

Worn out and weary of life, the aged pontiff raised his hands to heaven and cried, "Thou wilt arise, O Lord, and have mercy upon Zion!"

¹ Donato, 9 April, 1583: "Il sparagnar la spcsa e l'assicurar il Signor Giacomo, che lo desiderava, et il fuggir l'occasione di disgustarsi ogni dì piu per questo con Fiorenza sì come ogni dì avveniva, ha fatto venir S. S.^a in questa resolutione." [The desire to save expense and secure Signor Giacomo's safety, with that of escaping the disturbances daily arising between him and Florence, has led his holiness to this decision.]

² "Che il viver fuoruscito li torni piu a conto e di maggior sicurtà." Gregory XIII reigned from May 13, 1572, to April 10, 1585.

4. SIXTUS V

It would sometimes seem that even in confusion itself there exists some occult force, by which the man capable of steering through its mazes is formed and brought forward.

Hereditary principalities or aristocracies transmit their power from generation to generation throughout the world, but the sovereignty of the Church has this peculiarity, that its throne may be attained by men from the lowest ranks of society. It was from a station among the most humble that a pope now appeared, by whom those qualities, intellectual and moral, demanded for the suppression of the prevalent disorders, were possessed in their highest perfection.

When the provinces of Illyria and Dalmatia first became a prey to the successful armies of the Ottomans, many of their inhabitants fled into Italy. Arriving in melancholy groups, they might be seen seated on the sea-shore, and raising their hands imploringly towards heaven; among these fugitives would most probably have been found a Sclavonian by birth, named Zanetto Peretti; this was the ancestor of Sixtus V. Sharing the frequent lot of exiles, neither Zanetto nor his descendants, who had settled in Montalto, could boast of any great prosperity in the country of their adoption. Piergentili Peretti, the father of the future pope, was driven by his debts from Montalto, and it was only by marriage that he was enabled to rent a garden at Grotto a Mare, near Fermo. The place was a remarkable one: amidst the plants of the garden were seen the ruins of a temple to Cupra, the Etruscan Juno; rich fruits of the south grew up around it, for the climate of Fermo is milder and more beneficent than that of any other district in the March. Here a son was born to Peretti, on the 18th of December, 1521; but a short time before this birth, the father had been consoled by a divine voice, which, speaking to him in a dream, as he bemoaned his many privations, assured him that a son should be granted to him, by whom his house should be raised to high fortunes. On this hope he seized with all the eagerness of a visionary temperament, further excited by want, and naturally disposed to mysticism. He named the boy Felix.¹

That the family was not in prosperous circumstances, appears from what is related, among other things, of the child falling into a pond, when his aunt, "who was washing clothes at this pond," drew him out; it is certain that he was employed to watch the fruit, and even to attend swine. His father was not able to spare even the five bajocchi (three-pence) demanded monthly by the nearest schoolmaster; thus Felix had to learn his letters from the primers that other boys left lying beside him as they passed through the fields on their way to and from school. There was happily one member of the family who had entered the Church, Fra Salvatore, a Franciscan; this relative at length permitted himself to be prevailed on to pay the schoolmaster. Felix could then go to receive instruction with the other boys; he had a piece of bread for his dinner, and this he ate at mid-day by the side of a stream, which supplied him with drink for his meal. These depressed circumstances did not prevent the hopes of the father from being shared by the son. In his twelfth year he entered the order of the Franciscans, for the council of Trent had not then forbidden the vows to be taken thus early; but did not resign his name of good omen, and continued to be called Felix.

Fra Salvatore kept him in very strict order, joining the authority of an uncle to that of a father; but he sent him to school. The young Felix passed long evenings in conning his lessons, without supper, and with no better light than that afforded by the lantern hung up at the street crossing; and when this failed him, he would go to the lamp that burnt before the Host in some church. He was not remarked for any particular tendency to religious devotion, or profound researches in science; we find only that he made rapid progress, as well at the school of Fermo, as at the universities of Ferrara and Bologna. His particular talent seemed rather for dialectics, and he became a perfect master of that monkish accomplishment, the dexterous handling of theological subtleties. At the general convention of the Franciscans, in 1549, which commenced with an exhibition of skill in literary disputation, he was opposed to a certain Telesian, Antonio Persico of Calabria, who was at that time in high repute at Perugia; on this occasion he acquitted himself with a presence of mind and an intelligence, that first procured him notice and a certain degree of distinction:¹ from this time Cardinal Pio of Carpi, protector of the order, took a decided interest in his fortunes.

¹ Tempesti, Storia della Vita e Geste di Sisto V, 1754, has examined the archives of Montalto, for the origin of his hero. His information has been confirmed and amplified by Hübner, Sixte V, i. 204. The Vita Sixti V, ipsius manu emendata, is also authentic (MS. of the Altieri Library in Rome). Sixtus was born "cum pater Ludovici Vecchii Firmani hortum excoleret, mater Dianae nurui ejus perhonestae matronae domesticis ministeriis operam daret." This Diana lived to witness, in extreme old age, the pontificate of Sixtus: "Anus senio confecta Romam deferri voluit, cupida venerari eum in summo rerum humanarum fastigio positum, quem olitoris sui filium paupere victu domi suae natum aluerat." Further: "pavisse puerum pecus et Picentes memorant et ipse adeo non diffitetur, ut etiam prae se ferat." In the Ambrosiana, R. 124, there is, F. Radice dell' Origine di Sisto V, an Information, dated Rome, May 4, 1585, but it is not of great importance,

But it is to another circumstance that his progress is principally to be attributed.

In the year 1552, he was appointed Lént preacher in the church of the Santi Apostoli in Rome, and his sermons were very well received; his style was found to be animated, copious, fluent, and free from meretricious ornament; his matter was well arranged, his manner impressive, his utterance clear and agreeable. While preaching to a full congregation, he one day came to that pause in the sermon, customary among Italian preachers; and when he had reposed for a time, he took up the memorials, which are usually prayers and intercessions only: while reading these, he perceived a paper lying sealed in the pulpit, and containing matter of a totally different character ; all the main points of the sermons hitherto preached by Peretti, especially those touching the doctrine of predestination, were here set down, and opposite to each were written in large letters the words, "Thou liest." The preacher could not wholly conceal his amazement, he hurried to a conclusion, and instantly on reaching home despatched the paper to the Inquisition.¹ Very shortly afterwards the grand Inquisitor, Michele Ghislieri, entered his room ; the most searching examination ensued : in later times Peretti often described the terror caused him by the aspect of this man, with his stern brow, deep-set eyes, and strongly-marked features ; but he did not lose his presence of mind, answered satisfactorily, and betrayed weakness on no point whatever. When, therefore, Ghislieri saw that there was no shadow of suspicion, that the friar was not only guiltless, but also well versed in the Catholic doctrines, and firmly fixed in the faith, he became a totally different person, embraced Peretti with tears, and was his second patron.

¹ Sixtus V Pontifex Maximus: MS. of the Altieri Library: "Eximia Persicus apud omnes late fama Perusiae philosophiam ex Telesii placitis cum publice doceret, novitate doctrinae tum primum nascentis nativum ingenii lumen mirifice illustrabat.—Montaltus ex universa theologia excerptas positiones cardinali Carpensì inscriptas tanta cum ingenii laude defendit, ut omnibus admirationi fuerit."

From that time Fra Felice Peretti attached himself with a firm hold to the severe party just then beginning to gain ascendancy in the Church ; with Ignazio, Felino, and Filippo Neri, all of whom received the title of saints, he maintained the most intimate intercourse. It was of particular advantage to him that he was driven out of Venice by the intrigues of his brethren, for having attempted to reform the order. This greatly enhanced his credit with the representatives of the more rigid opinions, then fast acquiring the predominance. He was presented to Paul IV, and was sometimes called to give an opinion in cases of difficulty. At the council of Trent he laboured with the other theologians, and was councillor to the Inquisition. He had a considerable share in the condemnation of Archbishop Carranza, patiently submitting to the labour of seeking through the Protestant writers for all those passages which Carranza was accused of embodying in his works. He gained the entire confidence of Pius V, who appointed him vicar-general of the Franciscans, with the express understanding that his authority extended to the reformation of the order. This, Peretti carried into execution with a high hand. The principal offices of the order had hitherto been controlled by the commissaries-general. These functionaries he deposed, restored the primitive constitution according to which the supreme power was vested in the provincials, and made the most rigorous visitations. The expectations of Pius were not only fulfilled, they were surpassed. He considered his inclination for Peretti as an inspiration from above; refused all credence to the calumnies by which his favourite was persecuted, bestowed on him the bishopric of St. Agatha, and in 1570 exalted him to the college of cardinals.

¹ Narrative taken from the same MS. : "Jam priorem orationis partem exegerat, cum oblatum libellum resignat, ac tacitus, ut populo summam exponat, legere incipit. Quotquot ad eam diem catholicæ fidei dogmata Montaltus pro concione affirmarat, ordine collecta continebat singulisque id tantum addebat, literis grandioribus, 'Mentiris.' Complicatum diligenter libellum, sed ita ut consternationis manifestus multis esset, ad pectus dimittit, orationemque brevi præcisione paucis absolvit."

The bishopric of Fermo was also conferred on the successful monk. Robed in the purple of the Church, Felix Peretti returned to the abode of his fathers; to that place where he had once guarded the fruit-trees, and followed the swine; yet were neither the predictions of his father nor his own hopes entirely accomplished.

The various artifices employed by Cardinal Montalto, as Peretti was now called, to obtain the papal tiara, have been described and repeated, much and often. The affected humility of his deportment; how at the conclave he tottered along leaning on his stick, bent to the earth, and coughing at every step; but to him who reflects, no evidence will be requisite to prove that in all this there is but little truth. It is not by such means that the highest dignities are won.

Montalto kept guard over his own interests by a life of tranquil frugality and industrious seclusion. His recreations were, the planting of vines and other trees in his gardens near the church of Santa Maria Maggiore, which are still visited by the stranger, and doing such service as he could to his native town. His hours of labour he devoted to the works of St. Ambrose; an edition of which he published in 1580. He bestowed great pains on this work, but was not always sufficiently conscientious in adhering to the meaning of his author. In other respects his character does not appear to have been so guileless as it is occasionally represented. So early as 1574, he is described as learned and prudent, but also crafty and malignant.¹ He was doubtless gifted with remarkable self-control. When his nephew, the husband of Vittoria Accorambuoni, was assassinated, he was the first to request the pope to discontinue the investigation.

¹ A "Discorso sopra i soggetti papabili" under Gregory XIII speaks thus of Montalto: "La natura sua, tenuta, terribile, imperiosa et arrogante, non li può punto conciliare la gratia." Here we see that the disposition he displayed as pope was already obvious in the cardinal. Gregory XIII often said to those about him "caverent magnum illum cinerarium." Farnese saw him between the two Dominicans, Trani and Justinian, who themselves cherished hopes of election. The author of "Sixtus V. P. M." makes him say "Nae, Picenum hoc jumentum magnifice olim exiliet, si duos illos, quos hinc atque illinc male fert, carbonis saccos excusserit." He adds that it was precisely this conviction which led Vittoria Accorambuoni to marry the nephew of Sixtus. For the rest, the grand duke Francis of Tuscany had a large share in this election. In a despatch of the Florentine ambassador, Alberti, May 11, 1585 (Rome, Filza, n. 36), occurs the remark, "Vra Altezza sia sola quella che come conviene goda il frutto dell' opera che ella ha fatta" (he is speaking of this election) "per avere questo Pontefice amico e non altro se ne faccia bello." [Your highness alone will enjoy the fruit of your own work, as is right, since you alone will have the friendship of the pope in case of war.] In another Florentine despatch we read, "Il papa replica, che il gran duca aveva molte ragioni di desiderargli bene, perche egli era come qua agricoltore che pianta un frutto che ha poi caro insieme di vederlo crescere et andare avanti lungo tempo, agguingendoli che egli era stato quello che dopo il Signor Iddio aveva condotta quest' opera, che a lui solo ne aveva ad aver obbligo, e che lo conosceva, se ben di queste cose non poteva parlar con ogn'uno." [The pope replied that the grand duke had cause to wish him well, being like the husbandman, who, when he has planted a tree, rejoices to see it thrive and live long, adding that his highness alone had conducted this matter, under God, and that to him alone he was bound in gratitude; this he knew well, though he could not speak to many on that subject.] It is evident that much took place behind the scenes, of which we know little or nothing. Thus I wrote in the year 1837. Since then Baron Hubner has devoted comprehensive study to this affair, and has published in his "Sixte-Quint" (1870) a detailed story of the Conclave, taken from a large number of original documents in the archives of different countries (i. 181). From this we see that it was Cardinal Ferdinand de' Medici, the brother of the grand duke of Tuscany, who directed and carried through this election. Of special importance is a report which he sent to his brother on the very day of the election, April 24, 1585 (ii. 459). This is the main source from which I have gained material for the interpolation which distinguishes this from earlier editions.

This quality, which was universally admired, did more than anything else to open the way for him to the pontificate. For since the murder was attributed to Paolo Giordano Orsini, a near relative of the house of Medici, it was taken for granted that Montalto had quarrelled with that house beyond hope of reconciliation. Who could believe that the Medici would think of raising to the papacy a man who, as pope, would be in a position to revenge the injury he had suffered? This is, however, what actually happened. The grand duke of Tuscany had long been on terms of friendship with Montalto, and from his brother, Cardinal Ferdinand de' Medici, we learn, on his own authority, that from the very outset he had Montalto chiefly in view.¹ On his own merits Cardinal Farnese, the nephew of Paul III, the doyen of the sacred college, a relative of the king of Spain, and a man beloved of the people, had the best prospect of success. But the Medici were at open feud with the Farnesi, and were determined to prevent his election at all costs. In this resolve they were supported by Cardinal d'Este, whose connection with the house of France was as close as that of Farnese with Spain. Not that there was any actual opposition between France and Spain on this matter; Philip II was not in favour of Farnese, and the French ambassador in Rome had little weight. The decisive political influence over the election was the result of the relations of the great Italian families with one another. Medici and d'Este were both opposed to Farnese. The latter, however, was held in such respect that, had he realized the candidature of Montalto at the beginning, he would probably have been able to secure his exclusion. It was therefore necessary for Ferdinand de' Medici not merely to conceal, but to deny his real intentions. Nothing could further the success of this scheme so well as the breach between Montalto and the Medici, which was considered incurable. Farnese did not exert his influence against Montalto at the start, because he did not imagine that the

¹ "Io haveva sempre havuto la mira mia a Montalto principalmente."

Medici would support him. Thus Cardinal Ferdinand was able, in secret, to use his authority and his great practical talents to further the cause of Montalto, without hindrance on the part of Farnese. As usual, the cardinals were divided into factions, according to the popes by whom they had been created. The first to be won over by Medici was Cardinal Altemps. He was one of the nephews of Pius IV, the son of his sister Chiara, and formed the centre of the group of cardinals of his pontificate. Altemps was afraid lest, in the conflict of parties, his hated colleague, Ceneda, might attain to the tiara; and in order to exclude him, he agreed, after some hesitation, to the proposal of Medici, only stipulating that he should himself have the credit of the election, and that he should be assured of the favour of the future pope. The next to be approached was the nephew of Pius V, Cardinal Alessandrino, the leader of his group. Among the cardinals created by Pius V was Montalto himself, and Alessandrino assented readily to his election. All that remained now was to gain over the numerous cardinals of the late pope, the Gregorians. Their leader, Cardinal San-Sisto, hesitated to declare himself for Montalto. But he was not completely master of his faction, and many of the Gregorians, including the nephew of the late pope, were won over by Medici. It was then pointed out to San-Sisto, that Montalto would be elected, whether he wished it or not; whereupon he gave his consent. Even Farnese himself did not dare to hold out. Acting on Medici's advice, Montalto had remained in the background. He was informed of all that was being done, but the election was carried through without his co-operation. On April 24 the conclave took place in the chapel, and he was elected Head of the Church, not by means of the "scrutinium," but, as they expressed it, by "adoration." He knew how deeply he was indebted to Cardinal de' Medici, and, in return, he promised to regard him as his favourite son. Cardinal Ferdinand begged the new pope above all things not to employ any followers of Farnese in important offices, to which the pope agreed;¹ in the earliest appointments Medici had his own way throughout. Provision was also made for Cardinal Altemps.¹ Special precautions had already been taken to ensure the safety of Paolo Giordano, and now further measures were considered. The new pope declared that his adherents were also adherents of the house of Medici. In the conduct of the election it was not only the eminent qualities and great reputation of Montalto on which stress was laid; as the authentic narrative of the proceedings expressly states, his comparatively vigorous years were also taken into account, he being then sixty-four, and possessing a firm and healthy constitution; for all were persuaded that a man of unimpaired energies, whether physical or mental, was imperatively demanded by the circumstances of the times.

¹ "Mi rispose non esser conveniente servirsi di chi non volesse bene a casa nostra."

And thus did Fra Felice see himself at the summit of his wishes. It was doubtless with a feeling of proud satisfaction that he beheld the accomplishment of desires so noble and so legitimate. Every incident of his life in which he had ever believed himself to perceive an intimation of his exalted destiny now recurred to his thoughts. The words he chose for his motto were these: "Thou, O God, hast been my defender, even from my mother's womb."

In all his undertakings he believed himself, from this time, to possess the immediate favour of God. At his first accession to the throne, he announced his determination to exterminate all the bandits and evil-doers. He was persuaded that in the event of his own powers failing, God would send him legions of angels for so good a work.²

To this difficult enterprise he at once addressed himself with deliberate and inflexible resolution.

¹ Tempesti's statement (i. 78), taken from Santorio's Life, does not agree well with what Cardinal de' Medici relates.

² Dispaccio, Priuli, Maggio 11, 1585: Speech of Sixtus in the Consistory: "Disse di due cose che lo travagliavano, la materia della giustizia e della abbondanza, alle quali voleva attendere con ogni cura, sperando in Dio che quando li mancassero li ajuti proprii e forastieri, li manderà tante legioni di angeli per punire li malfattori e ribaldi, et esortò li cardinali di non usar le loro franchigie nel dar ricapito a tristi, detestando il poco pensiero del suo predecessore."

5. EXTIRPATION OF THE BANDITTI

The memory of Gregory XIII was regarded with intense dislike by his successor. Pope Sixtus departed instantly from the measures of the previous pontiff. He disbanded the greater part of the troops, and reduced the number of sbirri by one half. He determined, on the other hand, to visit with relentless severity whatever criminals should fall into his hands.

A prohibition had for some time existed against carrying short weapons, and more especially a particular kind of firearm. Four young men of Cora, nearly related to each other, were nevertheless taken with arms of this description about them. The day following was that of the coronation, and an occasion so auspicious was seized by their friends for entreating their pardon from the pontiff. "While I live," replied Sixtus, "every criminal must die."¹ That very day the four young men were seen hanging on one gallows near the bridge of St. Angelo.

A youth of the Trastevere was condemned to death for having offered resistance to the sbirri, who were proceeding to take his ass from him. On sight of the poor boy led weeping to the place where he was to die for so venial an offence, all were moved to pity. His youth was represented to the pope, who is said to have replied, "I will add a few years of my own life to his," and he caused the sentence to be executed.

The rigour of these first acts of the pontiff impressed all with terror; immediate obedience was secured by it to the commands he next sent forth.

Barons and communes were enjoined to clear their castles and towns of banditti; the losses sustained through the bands of outlaws were at once to be made good by the noble or commune within whose jurisdiction they might take place.²

¹ "Se vivo, facinorosis moriendum esse."

² Bull. t. iv. p. iv. p. 137. Bando, in Tempesti, i. ix. 14.

It had been customary to set a price on the head of a bandit; Sixtus now decreed that this should no longer be paid by the public treasury, but by the relations of the outlaw, or, if these were too poor, by the commune wherein he was born.

It is manifest that his purpose in this proceeding was to engage the interests of the barons, the municipalities, and even the kinsmen of the outlaws on the side of his wishes; he made an effort to enlist that of the banditti themselves in the same cause, promising to any one of them who should deliver up a comrade, living or dead, not his own pardon only, but also that of some of his friends whom he was at liberty to name, with a sum of money in addition.

When these commands had been carried into effect, and certain examples of their rigorous enforcement had been exhibited, the condition of the outlaws was presently seen to assume a very different character.

It happened fortunately for the purposes of Sixtus, that pursuit had from the beginning been successfully directed against some of the most formidable chiefs of large bands.

He declared that sleep had forsaken his eyes, because the priest Guercino, who called himself king of the Campagna, was still continuing his depredations, and had just committed new deeds of violence. This man had laid his commands on the subjects of the bishop of Viterbo to pay no further obedience to their lord; Sixtus prayed, as we are told by Galesinus, "that God would be pleased to deliver the Church from that robber;" and the following morning intelligence arrived that Guercino was taken. A gilded crown was placed on the severed head, which was instantly set up on the castle of St. Angelo. The man who brought it received its price of two thousand scudi, and the people applauded his holiness for so effectual a mode of administering justice.

In spite of all these severities, another leader of outlaws, called Della Fara, had the boldness to present himself one night at the Porta Salaria; he called up the watchmen, declared his name, and desired them to present a greeting on his part to the pope and the governor. Hearing this, Sixtus sent an order to those of the outlaw's own family, commanding them to find and bring him in, under pain of suffering death themselves. In less than a month from the date of this order, the head of Della Fara took its place beside that of Guercino.

It was on some occasions rather cruelty than justice that was now employed against the bandits.

Some thirty of them had intrenched themselves on a hill at no great distance from Urbino. The duke caused mules laden with provisions to be driven near their hold; the robbers did not fail to plunder this rich train, but the food had been poisoned, and they all died together. "When intelligence of this was carried to Sixtus V," says one of his historians, "the pope expressed great contentment."¹

In the capital, a father and son were led to death, though they persisted in declaring their innocence; the mother presented herself, entreating for a postponement only of the execution, when she could bring proof of innocence both for her husband and son: this the senator refused to grant. "Since you thirst for blood," she exclaimed, "I will give you enough of it!" Saying which, she threw herself from the window of the Capitol. The victims meanwhile arrived at the place of execution, neither could endure to see the other suffer, each implored permission to die first; seized with compassion, the people called aloud for mercy, while the savage executioner reproached them for causing useless delay.

The ordinances of Sixtus permitted no respect of persons; a member of one of the first families in Bologna, Giovanni count Pepoli, was known to have taken part in the excesses committed by the outlaws; he was strangled in prison, his estates and every other species of property being confiscated. No day passed without an execution: over all parts of the country, in wood and field, stakes were erected, on each of which stood the head of an outlaw. The pope awarded praises only to those among his legates and governors who supplied him largely with these terrible trophies, his demand was ever for heads: there is a sort of oriental barbarism in this mode of administering justice.

Such of the outlaws as escaped the officers of the pontiff,

¹ Memorie del Ponteficato di Sisto V: "Ragguagliato Sisto ne prese gran contento."

were destroyed by their own comrades. The promises of forgiveness and reward before alluded to had carried dissension into their bands; none dared trust even his nearest connection,—they fell by the hands of each other.¹

In this manner, and before the year had come to an end, the disturbances that had so harassed the Roman states, if not extinguished at the source, were yet suppressed at the outbreak; intelligence was received in the year 1586, that Monteblandano and Arara, the two last leaders of the bandits, had been put to death.

It was matter of great pride and rejoicing to the pope, when ambassadors now arriving at his court assured him that “in every part of his states through which their road had led, they had travelled through a land blessed with peace and security.”²

6. LEADING CHARACTERISTICS OF THE ADMINISTRATION

It was not only to the absence of vigilant control that those disorders against which the pontiff contended owed their birth, there were others also; and it is principally to his measures with regard to these, that the decided success of his efforts must be attributed. It has been common to regard Sixtus V as the sole founder of the judicial system by which the ecclesiastical states are governed; laws and institutions are ascribed to him that were in fact in existence long before his day. He is extolled as an incomparable master of finance, a statesman, wholly free from prejudice, and an enlightened restorer of antiquity. This arises from the fact that his natural qualities were such as readily impress themselves on the memory of man, and dispose him to the credence of fabulous and hyperbolical narrations.

¹ Disp., Priuli, so early as the 29th June, 1585, says, “Li fuorusciti s’ammazzano l’un l’altro per la provision del novo breve.”

² Vita Sixti V, i. m. em.: “Ea quies et tranquillitas ut in urbe vasta, in hoc conventu nationum, in tanta peregrinorum advenarumque colluvie, ubi tot nobilium superbae eminent opes, nemo tam tenuis, tam abjectae fortunae sit, qui se nunc sentiat cujusquam injuriae obnoxium.” According to Gualterius, Vita Sixti V, the latter applied the text: “Fugit impius nemine persequente.”

We are not then to believe all that we find related of this pontiff's regulations. It is nevertheless perfectly true, that his administration was an extremely remarkable one.

It was in certain particulars directly opposed to that of his predecessor. Gregory XIII was severe and energetic, but not clear-sighted in his general measures; individual cases of disobedience he readily overlooked. The attacks he made upon so many different interests on the one hand, with the unexampled impunity that he permitted to various offences on the other, gave rise to those miserable perplexities that he lived to bewail. Sixtus, on the contrary, was implacable towards individual cases of crime. His laws were enforced with a rigour that bordered on cruelty; but the character of his regulations generally was mild, conciliatory, and almost indulgent. Under Gregory, the obedient were not rewarded, nor were the refractory punished. Under Sixtus the insubordinate had every thing to fear, but whoever sought to gain his approbation might safely depend on receiving proofs of his favour. This mode of proceeding was admirably calculated for the promotion of his purposes.

We have seen the many disquietudes suffered by Gregory from the claims he sought to enforce on his neighbours regarding ecclesiastical affairs; these Sixtus would in no case pursue. He declared that it was incumbent on the head of the Church to uphold and extend the privileges of the temporal powers. In accordance with this principle, he restored the Milanese to their place in the Rota, of which Gregory had sought to deprive them. When the Venetians succeeded in bringing to light a brief by which their claims were definitively established in the affair of Aquileia, they did not themselves experience a more decided satisfaction than was evinced by the pope. He determined on suppressing the clause so much complained of in the bull "In Coenâ Domini." The Congregation taking cognizance of ecclesiastical jurisdiction in foreign countries, from whose interposition it was that the greater part of the disputes between the papal see and its neighbours had originated, Sixtus abolished entirely.¹ There is doubtless a certain magnanimity in the voluntary cession of contested rights; in the pontiff's case this course of proceeding was instantly productive of the most satisfactory results. He received an autograph letter from the king of Spain, who informed him that he had commanded his ministers in Milan and Naples to receive the papal ordinances with obedience no less implicit than that paid to his own. This moved the pope even to tears, "That the most exalted monarch of the world should," as he said, "so honour a poor monk." The Tuscan state declared itself devoted to the Church. Venice expressed entire satisfaction. These powers now adopted a different line of policy. The outlaws who had found refuge within their frontiers were given up to the pope. Venice prohibited their return into the papal states, and forbade such of her ships as should touch the Roman coasts to receive them on board. This delighted the pope. He declared that, to use his own words, "He would think of Venice for this some other day; he would suffer himself to be flayed alive for the republic, and would shed his blood for her." The bandits now found aid and refuge from no quarter, so that he no longer found it difficult to master them completely.

The unpopular measures by which Gregory had sought to enrich the treasury were wholly abandoned by Sixtus. He did not fail to punish the rebellious feudatories, but as earnestly set himself to conciliate and attach the great body of the nobles. Pope Gregory had deprived the Colonna family of their fortresses; Sixtus, on the contrary, made them advances of money, and assisted them to regulate the expenditure of their households.¹ The two great families, the Colonna and the Orsini, he united by marriages both with his own house and with each other. He gave one of his grand-nieces to the constable Marc Antonio Colonna, and another to the duke Virginio Orsini. The dower bestowed with each was of equal value, and their husbands received similar marks of favour. Their claims to precedence he adjusted by according it to the elder of either house. Highly exalted was the position now taken up by Donna Camilla, the pontiff's sister, surrounded as she was by her children, her noble sons-in-law and grand-daughters so magnificently allied.

¹ Lorenzo Priuli: Relatione, 1586: "E pontefice che non così leggermente abbraccia le querele con principi, anzi per fuggirle ha levata la congregazione della giurisdittione ecclesiastica;" in another place he says, chiefly in reference to Spain: "e stima di potere per questa via concluder con maggior facilità le cose e di sopportare con manco indegnità quelle che saranno trattate secretamente da lui solo."

The pope derived extreme gratification from the power he possessed of conferring benefits and privileges.

He proved himself more particularly a good and open-handed fellow-countryman to the people of the March. He restored many of their ancient immunities to the inhabitants of Ancona. In Macerata he instituted a supreme court of justice for the whole province. The college of advocates in that district he distinguished by the grant of new privileges. Fermo he erected into an archbishopric, and Tolentino into a bishopric. The little village of Montalto, where his ancestors had first taken up their abode, he raised by a special bull to the rank of an episcopal city; "For here," said he, "did our race take its fortunate origin." During his cardinalate he had established a school of science there, and he now founded a "college of Montalto" in the university of Bologna, for fifty students from the March; Montalto holding presentations for eight, and even the little Grotto a Mare receiving the right to send two.²

Loreto also he resolved to elevate into a city. Fontana

¹ Dispacci degli Ambasciatori straordinarii, 19 Ott., 25 Nov. 1585.

² He included even the neighbouring villages as part of Montalto,—Vita Sixti V, ipsius manu emendata: "Porculam Patrignorum et Mintenorum, quia Montalto haud ferme longius absunt quam ad teli jactum et crebris affinitatibus inter se et commerciis rerum omnium et agroium quadam communitate conjunguntur, haud secus quam patriae partem Sixtus fovit semper atque dilexit, omniaque iis in commune est elargitus, quo paulatim velut in unam coalescerent civitatem."

pointed out to him the difficulties that opposed this plan : "Give yourself no uneasiness about it, Fontana," said the pope, "the execution of this project will not cost me so much as the resolving on it has done." Portions of land were bought from the people of Recana, valleys were filled up, hills levelled, and lines of streets marked out. The communes of the March were encouraged to build houses, Cardinal Gallo appointed new civic authorities for the holy chapel ; by all which, the patriotism of Sixtus and his devotion to the Blessed Virgin were equally satisfied.

His solicitude was extended in different degrees to the several cities of all the provinces ; he made arrangements for preventing the increase of their debts, and for the control and limitation of their mortgages and alienations ; he caused a strict inquiry to be made into the management of their finances, and made regulations of various character, but all conducing to restore the lost importance and well-being of the communes.¹

Agriculture was equally indebted to the cares of Sixtus V : he undertook to drain the Chiana (swamp or pool) of Orvieto and the Pontine marshes, which last he visited in person. The river Sixtus (Fiume Sisto), which, until the time of Pius VI, was the best attempt made for draining the Pontine marshes, was cut across them by his command.

Neither was he negligent with regard to manufactures : a certain Pietro of Valencia, a Roman citizen, had offered his services for the establishment of a silk-manufacture. The thorough-going measures by which Sixtus attempted to forward his plans are extremely characteristic of this pontiff. He commanded that mulberry-trees should be planted throughout the States of the Church, in all gardens and vineyards, in every field and wood, over all hills, and in every valley,—wherever no corn was growing, these trees were to find place ; for it was fixed that five of them should be planted on every rubbio of land, and the communes were threatened with heavy fines in case of neglect.¹ The woollen manufactures, also, he sought earnestly to promote, "in order," as he says, "that the poor may have some means of earning their bread." To the first person who undertook this business he advanced funds from the treasury, accepting a certain number of pieces of cloth in return.

¹ Gualterius : "Ad ipsarum (universitatum) statum cognoscendum, corrigendum, constituendum quinque camerae apostolicae clericos misit." The Memorie, also, give evidence that these measures were of great utility. "Con le quali provisioni si diede principio a rihaversi le comunità dello stato ecclesiastico : le quali poi de tutto ritornarono in piedi : con quanto l'istesso provvedimento perfezionò Clemente VIII."

But we must not attribute dispositions of this kind to Sixtus alone; this would be unjust to his predecessors. Agriculture and manufactures were favoured by Pius V and Gregory XIII also. It was not so much by the adoption of new paths that Sixtus distinguished himself from earlier pontiffs, as by the energy and decision with which he pursued those on which they had already entered. Therefore it is that his actions have remained fixed in the memory of mankind.

Neither is it to him that the "congregations" of cardinals are wholly indebted for their origin,—the seven most important, those for the Inquisition, namely, the index, the affairs of councils, of the bishops, the monastic orders, the segnatura, and the consulta, were already in existence. Nor were the affairs of state left altogether unprovided for by these earlier congregations, the two last named having cognizance of judicial and administrative affairs. Sixtus added eight new congregations to these, of which two only were for ecclesiastical matters—one relating to the erection of new bishoprics, the other charged with the renewal and maintenance of Church usages:² the remaining six received the management of various departments in the government, as the inspection of roads, the repeal of oppressive imposts, the building of ships of war, the corn-laws (Annona), the Vatican press, and the university of Rome.¹ The pope's disregard of all system in these arrangements is most obvious,—partial and transient interests are placed on a level with those most permanent and general; his plans were nevertheless well carried out, and his regulations have, with very slight changes, been persisted in for centuries.

¹ Cum sicut accepimus, 28 Maji, 1586; Bull. Cocq. iv. 4. 218. "Bombicinam sericam lanificiam vitreamque artes in urbem vel induxit vel amplificavit. Ut vero serica ars frequentior esset, mororum arborum seminaria et plantaria per universam ecclesiasticam ditionem fieri praecepit, ob eamque rem Maino cuidam Hebreo ex bombicibus bis in anno fructum et sericam amplificaturum sedulo pollicenti ac recipienti maxima privilegia impertivit."

² "Congregation de sacri riti e cerimonie ecclesiastiche, delle provisioni consistoriali: a questa volle appartenesse la cognitione delle cause dell' ertitione di nove cattedrali."

With regard to the personal character of the cardinals, he fixed a very high standard. "Men of true distinction, their morals most exemplary, their words oracles, their whole being a model and rule of life and faith to all who behold them; the salt of the earth, the light set upon a candlestick."² Such were the cardinals in the theory of Sixtus: in his practice these demands were not always strictly adhered to. He had, for example, nothing better to plead in behalf of Gallo, whom he had raised to that dignity, than that he was his servant, for whom he had many reasons to feel regard, and who had once received him very hospitably when on a journey.³ He nevertheless established a rule even in this department of his government, which if it has not been adhered to invariably, has yet much affected the subsequent practice; he limited, namely, the number of cardinals to seventy; "as Moses," he remarks, "chose seventy elders from among the whole nation, to take counsel with them."

This pontiff has also received the credit of having abolished nepotism; but, considering the question more closely, we find that this was not done by him. The habit of unduly exalting the pontifical house had greatly declined under Pius IV, Pius V, and Gregory XIII; the favours bestowed on the papal nephews had sunk to insignificance. Pius V more especially deserves commendation in this particular, since he forbade the alienation of Church property by an express law. The earlier forms of nepotism were then extinct before the times of Sixtus V, but among the popes of the succeeding century it re-appeared under a different form. There were always two favoured nephews or kinsmen, of whom one, raised to the cardinalate, acquired the supreme administration of affairs, ecclesiastical and political; the other, remaining in a secular station, was married into some illustrious family, was endowed with lands and "luoghi di monte," established a majorat, and became the founder of a princely house. If we now ask by whom this mode of nepotism was introduced, we shall find that though its rise was gradual, yet it grew to maturity under Sixtus V. Cardinal Montalto, whom the pope loved so tenderly that he even put a restraint on the impetuosity of his temper in his favour, gained admission to the consulta, and a share at least in the administration of foreign affairs: his brother Michele became a marquis, and founded a wealthy house.

¹ "Sopra alla grascia et annona—sopra alla fabbrica armamento e mantenimento delle galere—sopra gli aggravi del popolo—sopra le strade, acque, ponti e confini—sopra alla stamperia Vaticana (he gave the first manager of the ecclesiastical press a residence in the Vatican, and 20,000 scudi for ten years)—sopra l'università dello studio Romano."

² Bulla: Postquam verus ille; 3 Dec. 1586. Bullar. M. iv. iv. 279.

³ Though Sixtus could endure no other form of contradiction, he could not escape that from the pulpit. The Jesuit Francis Toledo said, with regard to this, in one of his sermons, that a ruler sinned who bestowed a public office as reward for private services. "Non perche," he continued, "uno sia buon coppiere o scalco, gli si commette senza nota d'imprudenza o un vescovato o un cardinalato." It was in point of fact a cook that Cardinal Gallo had been. (Memorie del ponteficato di Sisto V.)

Yet we are not to conclude that Sixtus thus introduced a system of governing by nepotism. The marquis possessed no influence whatever, the cardinal none over essential interests.¹ To have allowed them any, would have been wholly at variance with the pontiff's mode of thinking. There was something cordial and confiding in the favours he bestowed, and they procured him the good-will not of individuals only, but of the public also. The helm of government was, however, in no case resigned to another hand; he was himself sole ruler. He appeared to regard the congregations with very high consideration, and pressed the members to give their free unfettered opinions; but whenever any one of them did so, he became irritated and impatient.² He persisted obstinately in the execution of his own will. "With him," says Cardinal Gritti, "no man has a voice, even in counsel,—how much less then in decision."¹ His personal and provincial attachments were never permitted to interfere with his general government, which was invariably rigid, thorough-going, and above all arbitrary.

¹ Bentivoglio, Memorie, p. 90: "Non aveva quasi alcuna partecipazione nel governo." [There was scarcely a single person who had any participation in the government.]

² Gualterius: "Tametsi congregationibus aliisque negotia mandaret, illa tamen ipse cognoscere atque conficere consuevit. Diligentia

These characteristics were exhibited in no department more strikingly than in that of finance.

7. FINANCES

The Chigi family in Rome are in possession of a small memorandum-book, kept by Sixtus in his own handwriting while yet but a poor monk.² With the utmost interest does the reader turn over the leaves of this document, wherein he has noted all the important interests of his life: the places he preached in during Lent, the commissions he received and executed, the books that he possessed, in what manner they were bound, whether singly or together, are here noted down; finally, all the details of his small monkish house-keeping are given with the utmost exactitude. We read in these pages how Fra Felice bought twelve sheep of his brother-in-law Baptista; how he paid first twelve florins, and afterwards two florins and twenty bolognins for these sheep, so that they became his own property; how the brother-in-law kept them, receiving half the profits, as was the custom of Montalto, with many other matters of like character. We perceive with how close an economy he guarded his small savings, how minutely he kept account of them, and how at length they amounted to some hundred florins; all these details one follows with interest and sympathy, remarking throughout, the same economical exactitude which this incredibilis sciendi cognoscendique omnia, quae a rectoribus urbis, provinciarum, populorum omnium, a ceteris magistratibus sedis apostolicae agebantur."

¹ Gritti, Relatione: "Non ci è chi abbi con lui voto decisivo, quasi ne anche consultivo."

² Memorie autografe di papa Sisto V.

Franciscan afterwards brought to bear on the government of the papal states. His frugality is a quality for which he gives himself due praise in every bull that affords him opportunity for introducing the subject; and even in many of his inscriptions; it is certain that no pope, either before or after him, administered the revenues of the Church with so good an effect.

The treasury was utterly exhausted when Sixtus V ascended the papal chair, and he complains bitterly of Pope Gregory, whom he accuses of having spent the treasures of his predecessor and his successor, as well as his own;¹ he conceived so bad an opinion of this pontiff, that he ordered masses to be said for his soul, having seen him in a dream enduring the torments of the other world. The revenues of the state were found to be anticipated up to the following October.

All the more earnestly did he set himself to the task of replenishing the public coffers, and in this he succeeded beyond his expectations. In April, 1586, at the close of the first year of his pontificate, he had already gathered a million scudi in gold. To this he added a second million in November, 1587, and in the April following a third. Thus an amount of more than four millions and a half of silver scudi was laid up by the early part of 1588. When Sixtus had got together one million, he deposited it in the castle of St. Angelo, dedicating it, as he says, "to the Holy Virgin, the mother of God, and to the holy apostles Peter and Paul." In this bull he tells us that he "not only surveyed the billows on which the little bark of St. Peter was now sometimes tossing, but also the storms that are threatening from the distance. Implacable is the hatred of the heretics; the faithful are menaced by the power of the Turk, Assur, the scourge of God's wrath." The Almighty, in whom he trusted, had taught him that

¹ Vita e Successi del Cardinal di Santaseverina. MS. Bibl. Alb.: "Mentre gli parlavo del collegio de' neofiti e di quel degli Armeni, che havevano bisogno di soccorso, mi rispose con qualche alteratione, che in castello non vi erano danari e che non vi era entrata, che il papa passato havea mangiato il ponteficato di Pio V e suo, dolendosi acrememente dello stato nel quale haveva trovato la sede apostolica."

"even by night also shall the father of the family be watchful, and shall follow that example given by the patriarchs of the Old Testament, who had ever large treasures stored in the temple of the Lord."

He decided, as is well known, on what contingencies those were, that would make it lawful to have recourse to this fund. They were the following: a war undertaken for the conquest of the Holy Land, or for a general campaign against the Turks; the occurrence of famine or pestilence; manifest danger of losing any province of Catholic Christendom; hostile invasion of the ecclesiastical states; or the attempt to recover a city belonging to the papal see. He bound his successors, as they would shun the wrath of Almighty God, and of the holy apostles Peter and Paul, to confine themselves within the limits thus assigned them.¹

The merit of this arrangement we leave for the moment unquestioned, to inquire by what means the pontiff contrived to amass a treasure, so astonishing for the times he lived in.

The direct revenues of the papal see could not account for it; these, as Sixtus himself informs us, were not in their net product more than two hundred thousand scudi a year.²

The savings of the pope were considerable, but not equal to this amount. His retrenchments were certainly very close, the expenses of his table being reduced to six pauls a day (nearly three shillings of our present money). He abolished many useless offices of the court, and disbanded a part of the troops. But we have the authority of the Venetian Delfino for the fact, that all this did not lessen the expenditure of the camera by more than one hundred and fifty thousand scudi; and we learn, besides, from Sixtus himself, that his reduction of expense was to the amount of one hundred and forty-six thousand scudi only.³

¹ Ad Clavum; 21 April, 1586. Cocq. iv. iv. 206.

² Dispaccio Gritti, 7 Giugno, 1586. The pope blames Henry III, because, with an income of three millions, he saves nothing. "Con addur l'esempio di se medesimo nel governo del ponteficato, che dice non haver di netto piu di 200000 sc. all' anno, battuti li interessi de' pontefici passati e le spese che convien fare."

³ Dispaccio Badoer, 2 Giugno, 1589.

We find then, that with all his economy and by his own shewing, the net revenue was increased to 350,000 scudi, and no more. This would scarcely suffice for the buildings he was engaged in; what then would it do towards the amassing of so enormous a treasure?

The extraordinary system of finance established in the States of the Church has already been considered; we have seen the continued increase of imposts and burdens of all sorts, without any corresponding increase of the real income; we have observed the multiplicity of loans by the sale of offices and by monti, with the ever-augmenting incumbrances laid on the State for the necessities of the Church. The many evils inseparable from this system are manifest, and, hearing the eulogies so liberally bestowed on Sixtus V, we at once infer that he found means to remedy those evils. What then is our amazement, when we find that he pursued the same course in the most reckless manner; nay, that he even gave to this system so fixed a character as to render all future control or remedy impossible!

In the sale of offices it was that Sixtus found one chief source of his treasures. He raised in the first instance the prices of many that had been obtained by purchase only from periods long before his own. Thus the office of treasurer to the camera, of which the price till now had been 15,000 scudi, he sold for 50,000 to one of the Giustiniani family; and, having raised him to the college of cardinals, he sold it again to a Pepoli for 72,000 scudi. This second purchaser being also invested with the purple, Sixtus appropriated one half the income of the office, namely 5,000 scudi, to a monte; and thus mulcted, he sold it once more for 50,000 golden scudi. In the next place he began to sell certain positions that up to his time had always been conferred gratuitously; as, for example, the notariates, the office of fiscal, with those of commissary-general, solicitor to the camera, and advocate of the poor: for all these he now obtained considerable sums; as 30,000 scudi for a notariate, 20,000 for a commissariat-general, &c. Finally, he created a multitude of new offices, many of them very important ones, such as those of treasurer to the dataria, prefect of the prisons, &c., and some others. Of his invention are, besides, the "twenty-four referendaries," from which, as from notariates in the principal cities of the state, and from "two hundred cavalierates," he derived very large sums of money.

When all these means are taken into account, the mode by which Sixtus amassed his treasure is no longer problematical. The sale of offices is computed to have brought him 608,510 golden scudi, and 401,805 silver scudi, making together nearly a million and a half of silver scudi;¹ but if these sales of places had before caused undue pressure on the state, from their involving, as we have shewn, a share in the rights of government under plea of a loan, which rights were most rigorously enforced against the tax-payer, while the duties of these offices were never performed, how greatly was this evil now augmented! Offices were, in fact, considered as property conferring certain rights, rather than as an obligation demanding labour.

In addition to all this, an extraordinary increase was made by Pope Sixtus in the number of the monti; of these he founded three "non vacabili," and eight "vacabili," more than any one of his predecessors.

The monti were always secured, as we have seen, on new taxes; to this expedient Sixtus was at first most reluctant to have recourse, but he could devise no other. When he brought forward in the consistory his project of an investment of treasure for the Church, Cardinal Farnese opposed the idea, observing that his grandfather Paul III had thought of this plan, but had resigned it on perceiving that it could not be accomplished without imposing new taxes. The pope turned on him fiercely; the intimation that a previous pontiff had been wiser than himself put him in a fury. "That," he retorted, "was because there were certain great spendthrifts under Paul III, who by the blessing of God are not permitted to exist in our times." Farnese reddened and made no reply,² but the result shewed that he was right.

¹ Calculation of the Roman Finances under Clement VIII, in a detailed MS. in the Barberini library, Rome.

² Memorie del ponteficato di Sisto V. "Mutatosi per tanto nel volto mentre Farnese parlava, irato piu tosto che grave gli rispose ;

In the year 1587, Sixtus would no longer endure restraint from considerations of this kind: he laid heavy imposts on the most indispensable articles of daily use, such as firewood, and the wine sold by retail in the wine-shops of the city, as also on the most toilsome occupations, that of towing barges up the Tiber by means of buffaloes or horses, for example: with the money thus gained he established monti. He debased the coinage, and a small money-changing trade having arisen from this fact, he turned even that circumstance to account, by selling permission to those who stationed themselves at the corners of the streets with a view to such traffic.¹ His attachment to the March did not prevent him from burdening the trade of Ancona by a duty of two per cent. on her imports. Even the manufactures, which were but just commencing their existence, he compelled to afford him at least an indirect advantage.² In these and similar operations his principal adviser was one Lopez, a Portuguese Jew, who had fled his country from fear of the Inquisition, and having gained the confidence of the datary and of Donna Camilla, at length obtained that of the pontiff himself. The mode in which Cardinal Farnese had been silenced, rendered the whole college very cautious

Non è maraviglia, Monsignore, che a tempo di vostro avo non si potesse mettere in opera il disegno di far tesoro per la chiesa con l'entrate e proventi ordinarii, perche vi erano di molti e grandi scialaquatori (a very favourite word of his), i quali non sono Dio gratia a tempi nostri: notando amaramente la moltitudine di figli e figlie e nepoti d'ogni sorte di questo pontefice. Arrossì alquanto a quel dire Farnese e tacque." [He remarked bitterly on the multitude of sons, daughters, and nephews of all kinds surrounding Paul III. At all this Farnese coloured somewhat, and remained silent.]

¹ For an old Giulio, besides ten bajocchi of the coin of Sixtus, a premium of from four to six quatrini was demanded.

² A good example of his administration. See the same memoirs: "Ordinò non si vendesse seta o sciolta a tessuta in drappi nè lana o panni se non approvati da officiali creati a tal effetto, nè si estraessero senza licenza degli stessi: inventione utile contro alle fraudi, ma molto piu in prò della camera, perche pagandosi i segni e le licenze se n'imborsava gran danaro dal pontefice." [He enacted that no silk or wool, raw or woven, should be sold without permission from officers appointed by him, nor come into the market without their license: this prevented fraud; but, better still, it aided the treasury, because the fees on licenses and stamps brought large sums to the purse of the pontiff.] This was but little likely to promote the welfare of trade.

in their opposition of the pope ; when the wine-tax just referred to was discussed in the consistory, Albano of Bergamo remarked, "Whatever pleases your holiness, I approve ; but should this impost displease your holiness, I shall approve still more."

By all these means so many new sources of income were rendered available, that the pontiff was enabled to take up a loan of two and a half million scudi (or, to be exact, 2,424,725), and pay interest thereon.

It must be admitted, however, that in this system of finance there is something exceedingly difficult to comprehend.

The country was most oppressively burdened by these taxes and by the multitude of places. Of the latter the salaries were made to depend on perquisites and fees, which must of necessity embarrass the course of justice and the administration. The taxes were imposed on the trade of the country, wholesale and retail, and could not but seriously impair its activity. And to what end was all this suffering inflicted ?

If we add the proceeds of the monti to those of the offices, we shall find that the whole sum thus produced to the camera was about equal to the treasure shut up by Sixtus in the castle of St. Angelo,—four and a half million scudi, and very little more. All the undertakings for which this pope has been so highly praised might very well have been accomplished with the amount of his savings.

To collect and hoard superfluous revenues is a proceeding sufficiently intelligible : to raise a loan for some present necessity is also easily comprehended, and in the course of things ; but to borrow money and impose heavy imposts, merely for the purpose of locking up the proceeds in a fortress, as a treasure for some future contingency, this is altogether foreign to the general practice of governments. Such was nevertheless the process which has gained the admiration of the world for the government of Sixtus V.

There was doubtless much tyranny and many unpopular characteristics in the administration of Gregory XIII. The reaction of these was most pernicious ; but I am decidedly of opinion that if he had succeeded in rendering the papal treasury independent of new loans and imposts for the future, the result would have been highly beneficial to the Roman states, and would probably have rendered their progress much more prosperous.

But the energy required to carry his views into all their consequences, was not fully possessed by Gregory; it was more especially wanting in the last years of his life.

This practical force it was, this power of executing what he willed, that characterized Sixtus V. His accumulation of treasure by means of loans, imposts, and venal offices, did but add burden to burden; nor shall we fail to perceive the consequence, but the world was dazzled by his success, which, for the moment, did certainly give the papal see increased importance. For the states surrounding those of the Church were in most cases always pressed for money, and the possession of wealth inspiring the pontiffs with a more perfect confidence in themselves, procured for them a more influential position in the eyes of their neighbours.

This mode of administering the state was indeed an essential part of the Catholic system of those times. Gathering all the financial strength of the realm into the hands of the ecclesiastical chief, it first rendered him the complete and exclusive organ of spiritual influence. For to what purpose could all this treasure be applied, if not to the defence and extension of the Catholic faith?

And in projects having these ends in view did Sixtus live, move, and have his being. His enterprises were sometimes directed against the East and the Turks, but more frequently against the West and the Protestants. Between these two confessions, the Catholic and Protestant, a war broke out, in which the pontiffs took most earnest part and interest.

This war we shall treat of in the following book: for the present let us direct our attention a little longer to Rome, which now made her influence once more felt by the whole world.

8. THE PUBLIC BUILDINGS OF SIXTUS V

Even in her external form, the city now assumed for the third time the aspect of capital of the world.

The splendour and extent of ancient Rome are familiar to all; its ruins and its history have alike contributed to bring it clearly before our eyes: these have been zealously explored, nor would the Rome of the middle ages less richly repay our diligence. This too was a noble city. The majesty of her basilicas, the divine worship ever proceeding in her grottoes and catacombs, the patriarchal temples of her pontiffs, preserving as they did the most revered monuments of early Christianity, all aided to render her august and imposing. The palace of the Caesars, still magnificent, and then possessed by the German kings, with the many fortresses erected by independent races, as if in defiance of those numerous powers by which they were surrounded, added further to the interest awakened.

But during the absence of the popes at Avignon, this Rome of the middle ages had fallen into decay, equally with the long-ruined Rome of antiquity.

In the year 1443, when Eugenius IV returned to Rome, the city was become a mere dwelling of herdsmen; her inhabitants were in no way distinguished from the peasants and shepherds of the surrounding country. The hills had been long abandoned, and the dwellings were gathered together in the levels along the windings of the Tiber: no pavements were found in the narrow streets, and these were darkened by projecting balconies and by the buttresses that served to prop one house against another. Cattle wandered about as in a village. From San Silvestro to the Porta del Popolo all was garden and marsh, the resort of wild-ducks. The very memory of antiquity was fast sinking; the capitol had become "the hill of goats," the Forum Romanum was "the cow's field." To the few monuments yet remaining the people attached the most absurd legends. The church of St. Peter was on the point of falling to pieces.

When Nicholas at length regained the allegiance of all

Christendom, and had become enriched by the offerings of those pilgrims who had flocked to Rome for the jubilee, he determined to adorn the city with buildings that should compel all to acknowledge her as the capital of the world.

To effect this was, however, no work for the life of one man; the popes succeeding him also laboured at it for centuries.

Their exertions are sufficiently described by their respective biographers, and I do not repeat the details; the most effective and remarkable labourers, not as to the consequences only, but also as to the contrasts they presented, were Julius II and that Sixtus whose pontificate we are now considering.

When Sixtus IV had built the simple but substantial bridge of travertine which bears his name, thus forming a more convenient communication between the two shores of the Tiber, the inhabitants began to build on either bank with considerable activity. The lower city, which had now withdrawn to these banks of the river, was entirely restored under Julius II. Not content with his enterprise of St. Peter's church on the southern side, which was rising in great majesty under his direction, Julius also restored the palace of the Vatican, and across the declivity that separated the old buildings from the villa of Innocent VIII, called the Belvedere, he laid the foundation of the Loggie, one of the most admirably conceived works in existence. At no great distance from these erections, his kinsmen of the Riario family, and his treasurer, Agostino Chigi, were all building palaces of great beauty, each in emulation of the other. Of these, that of Chigi, the Farnesina, is unquestionably the finest, admirable for the perfection of its plan and the grace of its construction, but most of all for the rich decorations it received from the hand of Raphael. To the north of the Tiber, Julius also displayed his munificence by completing the Cancellaria with its fine court (cortile), which from the purity and harmony of its proportions is considered the most beautiful in the world. The example he gave was eagerly followed by his cardinals and nobles; among them Farnese, the magnificent entrance of whose palace has gained it the reputation of being the most perfect in Rome ; and Francesco del Rio, who boasted of his house that "it should last till a tortoise had completed the tour of the globe." The Medici meanwhile filled their dwelling with the most varied treasures of art and literature ; while the Orsini adorned their palace on the Campofiore with painting and sculpture both within and without.¹ The remains of that magnificent period, when the noble works of antiquity were so boldly rivalled, do not receive all the attention they merit, from the stranger who passes them in his walks around the Campofiore and across the Piazza Farnese. "The genius, emulation, and fertility of spirit characterizing this bright epoch, produced a general prosperity in the city. In proportion to the increase of the people, buildings were erected on the Campo Marzo, and around the mausoleum of Augustus. These were further extended under Leo X. Julius had previously constructed the Lungara on the southern shore, and opposite to the Strada Giulia on the northern bank. The inscription still remains wherein the conservators boast that Julius had traced out and given to the public these new streets, "in accordance with the majesty of his newly-acquired dominions."

The plague and the sack of the city occasioned a large decrease of the population ; which again suffered during the troubles under Paul IV. It did not recover from these injuries until some time after, when an increase of the inhabitants was seen to accompany the return of the Catholic world to its allegiance.

The re-occupation of the deserted hills had been contemplated by Pius IV. The palace of the Conservators on the Monte Capitolino was founded by him ; and it was for the same pontiff that Michael Angelo erected the church of Santa Maria degli Angeli, on the Viminal, from the ruins of the baths of Diocletian. The Porta Pia, on the Quirinal, still bears his name and inscription :² additions were made to the same quarter by Gregory XIII.

¹ See Opusculum de Mirabilibus novae et veteris Urbis Romae, editum a Francisco Albertino, 1515 ; more especially the second part, De novâ urbe.

² Luigi Contarini, Antichità di Roma, p. 76, bestows high praise

But these were all vain labours only, so long as the hills remained destitute of water.

And here it was that Sixtus V achieved a well-merited glory. He has distinguished himself from all other pontiffs, and rivalled the ancient Caesars, by supplying the city with pure streams of water, brought into it by means of colossal aqueducts. This he did, as he tells us himself, "that these hills, adorned in early Christian times with basilicas, renowned for the salubrity of their air, the pleasantness of their situation, and the beauty of their prospects, might again become inhabited by man." "Therefore," he adds, "we have suffered ourselves to be alarmed by no difficulty, and deterred by no cost." He did in fact declare to the architects from the commencement, that he desired to produce a work whose magnificence might compete with the glories of imperial Rome. He brought the Aqua Marcia from the Agro Colonna, a distance of two and twenty miles, to Rome; and this in defiance of all obstacles, carrying it partly underground and partly on lofty arches. How great was the satisfaction with which Sixtus beheld the first stream of this water pouring its bright wealth into his own vineyard (vigna); still further did he then bear it onward to Santa Susanna, on the Quirinal. From his own name he called it the "Aqua Felice," and it was with no little self-complacency that he placed a statue by the fountain, representing Moses, who brings water, streaming from the rock, at the touch of his staff.¹

Not only the immediate neighbourhood, but the whole city, drew at once great advantage from this aqueduct. Twenty-seven fountains were supplied by the Aqua Felice, which gives 20,537 cubic metres of water every twenty-four hours.

From this time building on the hills was resumed with great activity, which Sixtus further stimulated by the grant on the efforts of Pius IV: "S'egli viveva ancora 4 anni, Roma sarebbe d'edificii un'altra Roma." [Had he lived four years longer, Rome would have been another city as to its buildings.]

¹ Tasso's "Stanze all'Acqua Felice di Roma" (Rime, ii. 311) describe how the water at first flows along a gloomy path, and then bursts joyously forth to the light of day to look on Rome as Augustus beheld it.

of special privileges. He levelled the ground about the Trinità de' Monti, and laid the foundation of the steps descending to the Piazza di Spagna, which afford the most direct line of communication between that height and the lower city.¹ Along the summit he laid out the Via Felice and the Borgo Felice, opening streets that even to our day continue to be the great thoroughfares from all directions to Santa Maria Maggiore. It was his purpose to connect all the other basilicas by spacious avenues with this church. The poets boast that Rome had nearly doubled her extent, and was again resuming her old abodes.

These fine constructions on the heights were not the only works by which Sixtus distinguished himself from earlier popes. His designs were, in some respects, directly opposed to the purposes and ideas of his predecessors.

Under Leo X, the ruins of ancient Rome were regarded with a species of religious veneration. The presence of a divine genius was hailed in these relics with rapturous delight; with a ready ear did that sovereign listen to him who exhorted to the preservation of "all that yet remains to us of our city; that ancient mother of the greatness and renown of Italy."²

¹ Gualterius: "Ut viam a frequentioribus urbis locis per Pincium collem ad Exquilias commodè strueret, Pincium ipsum collem ante sanctissimæ Trinitatis templum humiliorem fecit et carpentis rhedisque pervium reddidit scalasque ad templum illud ad utroque portae latere commodas perpulcrasque ad modum extruxit, e quibus jucundissimus in totam urbem prospectus est."

² Extract from Castiglione's well-known letter to Leo X. Lettere di Castiglione; Padova, 1796, p. 149. But I can find no intimation here of a plan for excavating the ancient city; rather it seems to me that this is the preface to a description of Rome, with a plan, reference being frequently made both to the plan and description. It is highly probable that the works of Raphael himself were to be introduced by this preface, an opinion that is strengthened by the similarity of certain expressions in this letter with those of the well-known epigram on the death of Raphael: "vedendo quasi il cadavero di quella nobil patria così miseramente lacerato;" "urbis lacerum ferro igni annisque cadaver Ad vitam revocas." This certainly does intimate a restoration, but in idea only, in a description, not more; an opinion not essentially at variance with those before expressed—it is rather confirmatory of them. I think we may conclude that the work with which Raphael occupied the latter part of his life was far advanced, since a dedication Distant as earth from heaven were all the ideas of Sixtus from these modes of view and feeling; for the beauties of antiquity, this Franciscan had neither comprehension nor sympathy. The Septizonium of Severus, a most extraordinary work, could find no favour in his eyes, though surviving the storms of so many centuries. He demolished it entirely, and carried off a part of its columns for the church of St. Peter.¹ His rage for destruction seemed equal to his zeal in building, and great fears were entertained that he would go beyond all bounds of moderation in both. Let us hear what Cardinal Santa Severina relates as to this matter—were it not the testimony of an eye-witness, we should find it incredible: "When it was perceived," he tells us, "that the pope seemed resolving on the utter destruction of the Roman antiquities, there came to me one day a number of the Roman nobles, who entreated me to dissuade his holiness with all my power from so extravagant a design." They addressed their petition to that cardinal, who was then, without doubt, himself considered as a confirmed zealot. Cardinal Colonna united his prayers to theirs. The pope replied, that he would "clear away the ugly antiquities," but would restore all others that required restoration. And now for an instance of those he found "ugly." The tomb of Cecilia Metella, which was even then one of the most valuable relics of the republican times, and a monument of admirable sublimity,—this it was among his purposes to destroy! How much may not have perished beneath his hand!

He could not persuade himself to endure the Laocoon and the Apollo Belvedere in the Vatican without great difficulty, and would not suffer the ancient statues with which the Roman citizens had enriched the Capitol to retain their places. He threatened to destroy the Capitol itself if they were not removed. These were a Jupiter of it was already composed in his name. What a name to add to the number of astyographers! These papers, with the plan, may have fallen into the hands of Fulvius, who probably took an active part in the researches.

¹ Gualterius: "Praecipue Severi Septizonii, quod incredibili Romanorum dolore demoliendum curavit, columnis marmoribusque usus est, passimque per urbem caveae videbantur, unde lapides omnis generis effodiebantur."

Tonans between Apollo and Minerva; the two first-named were in fact removed, and the Minerva was permitted to remain only because Sixtus had contrived to invest her with the character of Rome,¹ and Rome christianized, by taking the spear of the goddess from her hand and replacing it with a gigantic cross.

The columns of Trajan and of Antonine he restored in the same spirit, removing the urn which was believed to contain the ashes of the emperor from the former, which he dedicated to St. Paul. The column of Antonine was in like manner assigned to St. Peter, and from that time the statues of the two apostles have stood confronting each other on that airy elevation, overlooking the dwellings of men. The pontiff thought that he had thus secured a triumph for Christianity over paganism.²

He had set his heart on erecting the obelisk before St. Peter's, principally because "he desired to see the monuments of unbelief subjected to the cross on the very spot where the Christians had formerly suffered the bitter death of crucifixion."³

This was indeed a magnificent design, but his mode of conducting it was highly characteristic, evincing a singular mixture of despotism, grandeur, pomp, and bigotry.

He threatened to punish the architect, Domenico Fontana, who had worked his way up under his own eyes from the condition of a mason's apprentice, should the enterprise fail, or the obelisk sustain injury.

The task was one of exceeding difficulty; to lift this monument from its base near the sacristy of the old church of St. Peter, lower it to a horizontal position, remove it to the place assigned, and fix it on a new basis.

The work was undertaken with a consciousness in those concerned, that their enterprise was one which would be famed throughout all ages. The men employed, nine hundred in number, began by hearing mass, confessing and receiving the sacrament. They then entered the inclosure set apart for their labours, the master placing himself on a raised platform. The obelisk was protected by straw mats and a casing of planks firmly secured by strong iron bands. The monstrous machine which was to upheave it with thick ropes was set in motion by thirty-five windlasses, each worked by two horses and ten men. When all was ready, the signal was given by sound of trumpet. The first turn proved the efficacy of the means employed. The obelisk was lifted from the base on which it had rested during fifteen hundred years. At the twelfth turn it had risen two palms and three quarters, where it was held fast. The architect saw the ponderous mass (weighing, with its protections, more than a million Roman pounds) in his power. This took place, as was carefully recorded, on the 30th of April, 1586, at the twentieth hour (about three in the afternoon). A salute was fired from the castle of St. Angelo. All the bells of the city pealed forth, and the workmen carried their master round the inclosure in triumph, uttering joyous and reiterated acclamations.

¹ Passage from the life of Sixtus V, ipsius manu emendata, given in Bunsen's Beschreibung von Rom, i. p. 702.

² This at least is the opinion of J. P. Maffei, among others,—Historiarum ab excessu Gregorii XIII, lib. i. p. 5.

³ Vita Sixti V, i. m. c.: "Ut ubi grassatum olim supplicii in Christianos et passim fixae cruces, in quas innoxia natio sublata teterrimis cruciatibus necaretur, ibi supposita cruci, et in crucis versa honorem cultumque ipsa impietatis monumenta cernerentur."

Seven days were suffered to elapse, when the obelisk was lowered to the desired level with similar skill. It was then conveyed on rollers to its new destination; but it was not till the hot months had passed that they ventured to attempt the re-erection.

The day chosen by Sixtus for this undertaking was the 10th of September, a Wednesday (which he had always found to be a fortunate day), and that immediately preceding the festival of the Elevation of the Cross, to which the obelisk was to be dedicated. The workmen again commenced their labours by commending themselves to God, all falling on their knees as they entered the inclosure. Fontana, in making his arrangements, had profited by the description given in Ammianus Marcellinus of the last raising of an obelisk; he was, besides, provided with a force of a hundred and forty horses. It was considered peculiarly fortunate that the sky chanced to be clouded that day: all succeeded perfectly. The obelisk was moved by three great efforts, and an hour before sunset it was seen to sink upon its pedestal, formed by the backs of four bronze lions that seem to support it. The exulting cries of the people filled the air, and the satisfaction of the pontiff was complete. This work, which so many of his predecessors had desired to perform, and which so many writers had recommended, he had now accomplished. He notes in his diary that he has achieved the most difficult enterprise conceivable by the mind of man. He struck medals in commemoration of this event, received poems of congratulation in every language, and sent official announcements of his success to foreign powers.¹

The inscription he affixed is strangely worded ; he boasts of having wrested the monument from the emperors Augustus and Tiberius, to consecrate it to the holy cross ; and a cross was erected on the obelisk, a piece of the supposed true cross being inclosed within it. This proceeding is an eloquent expression of his whole mode of thought. The very monuments of paganism were to be made ministers to the glory of the cross.

Sixtus devoted himself with his whole spirit to his architectural undertakings. A herd-boy, brought up among fields and gardens, for him the city had peculiar attractions. He would not hear mention of a villa residence ; his best pleasure, as he declares himself, was "to see many roofs." He doubtless meant that his highest satisfaction was derived from the progress of his buildings.

Many thousand hands were kept constantly employed, nor did any difficulty deter him from his purpose.

¹ The despatches of Gritti of May 3 and 10, July 12, and Oct. 11, allude to this elevation of the obelisk. The effect is well described in the Vita Sixti V, ipsius manu emendata : "Tenuitque universae civitatis oculos novae et post 1500 amplius annos relatae rei spectaculo, cum aut sedibus suis avulsam tolleret molem, uno tempore et duodenis vectibus impulsam et quinque tricenis ergatis, quas equi bini homines denique agebant, in sublime elatam, aut cum suspensam inde sensim deponeret extenderetque humi junctis trabibus atque ex his ingenti composita traha, quae jacentem exciperet, aut cum suppositis cylindris (sunt hae lignae columnae teretes et volubiles) quaternis ergatis protracta paulatim per editum et ad altitudinem basis, cui imponenda erat, excitatum aggerem atque undique egregie munitum incederet, denique cum iterum erecta librataque suis reposita sedibus est."

The cupola of St. Peter's was still wanting, and the architects required ten years for its completion. Sixtus was willing to give the money, but he also desired to gratify his eyes by the completed building. He set six hundred men to work, allowing no intermission even at night. In twenty-two months the whole was finished, the leaden covering to the roof alone excepted; this he did not live to see.

The arbitrary and impetuous character of the pontiff was manifest even in labours of this kind. He demolished without remorse the remains of the papal patriarchium, which were by no means inconsiderable, and were singularly interesting. These antiquities were connected with the dignity of his own office, but he destroyed them nevertheless to erect his palace of the Lateran on their site; a building not at all wanted, and which excites a very equivocal interest, solely as one of the earliest examples of the uniform regularity of modern architecture.

How complete was the revolution which then took place in the relations of the age to antiquity! As in former times men emulated the ancients, so did they now; but their earlier efforts were directed towards an approach to their beauty and grace of form; now they sought only to vie with, or exceed them, in extent and magnitude. Formerly the slightest trace of the antique spirit was revered in however trifling a monument; now the disposition seemed rather to destroy these traces. One sole idea held predominance among the men of this day; they would acknowledge no other. It was the same that had gained ascendancy in the Church,—the same that had succeeded in making the State a mere instrument of the Church. This ruling idea of modern Catholicism had penetrated throughout the being of society, and pervaded its most diversified institutions.

9. GENERAL CHANGE IN THE INTELLECTUAL TENDENCY OF THE AGE

It is not to be supposed that the pope alone was subjected to the dominion of the spirit we have seen to prevail ; towards the close of the sixteenth century, a tendency became obvious in every manifestation of intellect directly opposed to that which had marked its commencement.

Highly significant of this change is the fact that the study of the ancients, which in the first part of the century had been a primary condition to all knowledge, had now greatly declined. Another Aldus Manutius had indeed appeared in Rome, and was professor of eloquence ; but neither for his Greek nor Latin did he find admirers. At the hour of his lectures he might be seen pacing up and down before the portal of the university with one or two hearers, the only persons in whom he found congeniality of sentiment or pursuit. How rapid a progress was made by the study of Greek in the early part of this century ! yet there did not exist at its conclusion one single Hellenist of reputation in all Italy.

Not that I would assert this change to be altogether symptomatic of decline ; it was in a certain sense connected with the necessary progress of science and literature.

For if in earlier times all science had been immediately derived from the ancients, this was now no longer possible. How enormous was the mass of knowledge brought together by Ulisse Aldrovandi, for example, during the labours of his long life and extensive travels, in comparison with any thing that could be possessed by the ancients ! In the construction of his museum he had laboured to produce completeness, and wherever the natural object was unattainable, had supplied its place by drawings, carefully appending to each specimen an elaborate description. How far, too, had the knowledge of geography extended beyond what had even been imagined by those best informed in the ancient world ! A more profound and searching spirit of investigation had arisen ; mathematicians had in earlier days sought only to fill up the chasms left by the ancients ; as, for example, Commandin, who, believing he had discovered that Archimedes had either read or written some treatise on gravitation, which was afterwards lost, was led by this supposition himself to investigate the subject. But by this very process men were conducted to more extensive observations ; even while seeking to pursue the light offered by the ancients, the mind of the student became freed from their tutelage. Discoveries were made that led beyond the circle prescribed by them, and these again opened new paths to further inquiries.

More especially did the study of nature attract zealous and self-relying students. For a moment men wavered between an acquiescence in the mysteries attributed to natural phenomena and the bold deep-searching examination of those phenomena ; but the love of science soon prevailed. An attempt was already made to produce a rational classification of the vegetable kingdom. In Padua, the science of anatomy was zealously pursued ; and a professor of that university was called " the Columbus of the human body." Inquirers marched boldly forward in all directions, and knowledge was no longer restricted to the works of the ancients.

It followed, if I am not mistaken, as a matter of course, that antiquity, being no longer studied with so exclusive an attention, as regarded the subject, could no longer exert its earlier influence with reference to form.

Writers of learned works began now to think principally of accumulating material. In the beginning of the century, Cortesius had embodied the essence of the scholastic philosophy, in spite of the intractable nature of his subject, in a well-written classical work, full of wit and spirit. But at this time, the subject of mythology, well calculated to call forth and to repay the most genial and imaginative treatment, was handled by Natale Conti in a dull and uninviting quarto. This author also wrote a history composed almost entirely of sentences quoted directly from the ancients, the passages whence he has borrowed being cited : but he does not possess one qualification for giving a genuine description ; a mere heaping together of the bare facts seemed sufficient for his contemporaries. We may safely affirm that a work like the Annals of Baronius, so entirely destitute of form,—written in Latin, yet without one trace of beauty or elegance, even in detached phrases,—could not have been thought of at the commencement of the century.

Nor was this departure from the track of the ancients, in science, in form, and in expression, the only change; others took place in all the social habits of the nation; changes by which an incalculable influence was exercised both on literature and art.

Republican and independent Italy, on whose peculiar circumstances the early development of her people, intellectual and social, had depended, was now no more; all the freedom and simplicity of intercourse proper to the earlier days had departed. It is worthy of note that titles came into use at this time. As early as the year 1520, it was remarked with disgust, that all desired to be called "Sir:" this was attributed to the influence of the Spaniards. About the year 1550, the old forms of address, so noble in their simplicity, were encumbered, whether in speech or writing, by ponderous epithets of honour; at the end of the century duke and marquis were titles prevailing everywhere; all wished to possess them, every man would fain be "Excellency." Nor are we permitted to consider this a mere trifle; even in the present day, when this system of titles is become old and familiar, they still have their effect; how much more then when all were new? In every other respect also, society became more rigid, stiff, and exclusive; the cheerful easy tone of manner, the frank intercourse of earlier times were gone for ever.

Be the cause of this what it may,—perhaps a change incident to the nature of the human mind,—thus much is manifest, that so early as the middle of the century a different spirit pervaded all productions; new wants were making themselves felt in the external forms, as in the living essence of society.

We find evidence of this change in many striking phenomena, and perhaps one of the most remarkable is the remodelling of Bojardo's Orlando Innamorato, by Berni. It is the same work, and yet altogether different; all the freshness and charm of the original have disappeared. On a more rigid examination, we shall find that Berni has invariably displaced the individual to substitute the universal; he has obliterated the unfettered expression of a lovely and most vivid nature, for the conventional decorums then and now demanded by Italian manners.¹ His success was perfect, the manufacture he presented was received with incredible approbation, and entirely superseded the original poem. How rapidly too, for it was not yet fifty years since Bojardo had first published his work!

This essential change, this infusion of a different spirit, may be traced through most of the productions of that period.

If the longer poems of Alamanni and Bernardo Tasso are tedious and uninviting, this does not proceed entirely from the absence of talent, in the case of the latter more especially. But the very conception of these works is cold. In compliance with the demands of a public that was certainly not very virtuous, but had put on manners of serious sedateness, both these writers chose immaculate heroes. Bernardo Tasso selected Amadis, of whom the younger Tasso says, "Dante would have retracted his unfavourable opinion of chivalric romance, had he known the Amadis of Gaul or of Greece; characters so full of nobleness and constancy." The hero of Alamanni was Giron le Courtoys, the mirror of all knightly virtues. His express purpose was to shew youth by this example, how hunger and night-watching, cold and heat, were to be endured; how arms should be borne; how justice and piety were best to be exemplified; how enemies were to be forgiven, and mercy extended to all. Proceeding with this their moral and didactic aim, entirely after the manner of Berni, and intentionally divesting the fable of its poetic basis, the results are works of infinite prolixity and insipid dulness.

The nation would seem, if we may venture on the expression, to have worked out and used up the whole amount of the poetical conceptions descending to it from its by-gone history, and from the ideas proper to the middle ages; it had even lost the power of comprehending them. Something new was sought for, but the creative genius would not come forth, nor did the life of the day present any fresh material. Up to the middle of the century, Italian prose, though from its nature didactic, was yet imaginative, life-like, flexible, and graceful. Gradually prose also became rigid and cold.

¹ In the academical treatise before alluded to, I have endeavoured to pursue this subject in a more detailed form.

And as with poetry, so was it with art. She lost the inspiration derived from her connection with religion, and soon after that which had animated her more profane efforts. Some few traces of it yet lingered in the Venetian school alone. How entirely had the disciples of Raphael, with one exception only, degenerated from their master. While they sought to imitate him, they lost themselves in artificial beauties, theatrical attitudes, and affected graces. Their works sufficiently shew in how total an absence of feeling and with how feeble a sense of beauty they were conceived. With the scholars of Michael Angelo it fared no better. Art no longer comprehended her object; the ideas that she had formerly taxed her powers to clothe with form were now abandoned. There remained to her only the externals of method.

In this state of things, when antiquity was deserted; when its forms were no longer imitated; when its science was left in the background, and far overpassed; when the old national poetry and all religious modes of conception were despised and rejected by literature and art, the resuscitation of the Church commenced. It obtained the mastery over the minds of men, either with their consent or in spite of their resistance, producing a radical change in the whole being and system of art and of literature.

Its influence was equally obvious in science, but if I am not mistaken, the effect was in this case of a totally different character from that exercised over art.

Philosophy, and indeed all science, now passed through a very important epoch. Having restored the genuine Aristotle, men soon began to set themselves wholly free from his authority in matters of philosophy, as had happened in other branches of knowledge and with other ancient writers, and proceeded to the unfettered investigation of the most recondite and highest problems. But from the very nature of things it was impossible that the Church could favour this freedom of inquiry; she lost no time in laying down first principles in a manner that permitted no doubt. The adherents of Aristotle had not unfrequently expressed opinions, such as the Church had never sanctioned, and which were derived from the light of nature only; might not something similar be apprehended from those who set themselves to oppose that philosopher? For their purpose was, as one of them expressed it, to compare the tenets of former teachers, with the original handwriting of God, the world and nature. This was a project of which it was difficult to determine the probable result; but whether discoveries or errors ensued, they could not fail to be deeply perilous; the Church, consequently, extinguished this evil in the germ. Telesius did not suffer his speculations to pass beyond the domain of physical science; he was nevertheless confined through his whole life to his small native town. Campanella was subjected to torture, and compelled to live in exile. The most profound thinker of all, Giordano Bruno, a true philosopher, after many persecutions and long wanderings, was at last seized by the Inquisition, sent to Rome, imprisoned and condemned to the flames, "not only," as the legal record sets forth, "as a heretic, but as a dangerous heresiarch, who had written things affecting religion, and unseemly."¹ How could men find courage for earnest investigation with such examples before them? One only of those who ventured on innovations found favour with Rome, and he did so, because his attacks on Aristotle were confined to the accusation that his principles were opposed to the Church and to Christianity. This was Francesco Patrizi. He believed himself to have discovered a genuine philosophical tradition, descending from the pretended Hermes Trismegistus, and which he traced through all succeeding ages. This tradition contradicted the views of Aristotle, and gave a clearer explanation of the Trinity than was to be found even in the Mosaic records. Patrizi was anxious to restore it, and to substitute its tenets for those of the Aristotelian philosophy. In all the dedications of his works he alludes to this purpose, and insists on the utility and necessity of its execution. His mind was peculiarly constituted: he was not without critical discernment, but evinces this quality, rather in what he has rejected than in what he adopts. He was invited to Rome, and maintained himself there in high credit, not by the influence of his works, which was extremely insignificant, but because the peculiarities of his opinions and the tendency of his labours were in harmony with the views of the Church.

¹ In a Venetian MS. now in the Archives of Vienna, under the title Roma, Espositioni, 1592, 28 Sett., will be found the original of a protocol respecting the surrender of Giordano Bruno. There appeared before the college the vicar of the patriarch, the father Inquisitor, and Tommaso Morosini, the assistant of the Inquisition. The vicar stated: "Li giorni passati esser stato ritenuto e tuttavia ritrovarsi nelle prigioni di questa città deputate al servizio del santo ufficio Giordano Bruno da Nola, imputato non solo di heretico, ma anco di heresiarcha, havendo composto diversi libri nei quali laudando assai la regina d'Inghilterra et altri principi heretici scriveva alcune cose concernenti il particular della religione che non convenivano se bene egli parlava filosoficamente: e che costui era apostata, essendo stato primo Frate domenicano, che era vissuto molt' anni in Ginevra et Inghilterra, e che in Napoli et altri luoghi era stato inquisito della medesima imputatione: e che essendosi saputa a Roma la prigionia di costui, lo ill^{mo} Santa Severina supremo inquisitore haveva scritto e dato ordine che fusse inviato a Roma — con prima sicura occasione."

[That there had been arrested within the last few days, and was then in the prison of the Inquisition, a certain Giordano Bruno of Nola, accused not of heresy only, but also as an heresiarch, he having written various books wherein he spoke in terms of praise of the English queen and other principal heretics; and also had said divers things concerning religion, which were not becoming, even though he spoke philosophically; that this man was besides an apostate, having been a Dominican friar, but had lived many years in Geneva and in England: of these things he had also been accused in Naples and other places; that his arrest being communicated to the authorities in Rome, the most illustrious cardinal Santa Severina had written and commanded that he should be sent to Rome by the first safe opportunity.] Such an opportunity these officers now had. To this application they received no immediate reply; and, in the afternoon, the father Inquisitor again appeared; but the Savi replied: "Che essendo la cosa di momento e consideratione e le occupationi di questo stato molte e gravi non si haveva per allhora potuto fare resolutione." [That the matter was of weight, and demanded reflection; that the affairs of the state were pressing and numerous, so that they had not yet been able to come to any decision. The Inquisitor was very earnest for their reply, because the boat was about to depart.] But this time it had to go without the prisoner; whether his being afterwards surrendered was in consequence of further application, I have not been able to ascertain.

The investigation of physics and natural history was at that time almost inseparably connected with philosophical inquiry. The whole system of ideas as previously accepted was called in question ; there was indeed among the Italians of that period an earnest tendency towards the vigorous pursuit of truth, a zeal for progress, a noble loftiness of anticipation. Who shall say to what glorious results this might have led ? But the Church set up a barrier which they must not overpass ; woe to him who should be found beyond it.

That the restoration of Catholicism produced unfavourable effects on science it is impossible to deny. Poetry and art, on the contrary, received benefit from its renovation ; a living subject, a prolific material was needful to them, and this they once more received from the Church.

Of the dominion exercised by the regenerated spirit of religion over the minds of men, we have an example in Torquato Tasso. His father, Bernardo, had chosen a hero of blameless moral character ; he took a step further in the same direction. The crusades had been selected as the subject of a poem by another writer of that day, on the ground that "it is better to handle a true argument in a Christian fashion, than to seek a little Christian fame from an argument without truth." Torquato Tasso did likewise. He sought his hero not in fable, but history, and Christian history. Godfrey is more than Aeneas, he is like a saint satiated with the world and its passing glories. The work would nevertheless have been very tedious and dry, had the poet contented himself with the mere representation of such a personage ; but Tasso seized on all the resources offered by the sentimental and enthusiastic side of religious feeling ; this harmonized most happily with the fairy world, whose rainbow tints he has wrought into the fabric of his poem. The work is perhaps occasionally somewhat prolix, the effect is not always fully made out, yet on the whole it is replete with feeling and fancy, national spirit, and truth of character. The love and admiration of his countrymen were secured by it to the author, and have been continued to his memory even down to our own days. But what a contrast does he present to Ariosto! At an earlier period the art of poetry had fallen off from the Church. Religion, now rising in the might of her renovated empire, subjected poetry once more to her allegiance.

At no great distance from Ferrara, where Tasso composed his poem, at Bologna namely, there soon after arose the school of the Caracci, the rise of which marks a general revolution in painting.

When we ask whence this change proceeded, we are assured that it was due to the anatomical studies of the Bolognese academy,—to their eclectic imitation, and their learned style of art. There was, unquestionably, great merit in the zeal with which they sought, in their manner, to approach the truth of nature: but the subjects they selected, and the spirit in which these were treated, appear to me no less important.

The most earnest efforts of Lodovico Caracci were devoted to a realization of the ideal of Christ. He is not always successful; but in the Calling of St. Matthew he has indeed most happily presented the mild and serious man, full of truth and fervour, of grace and majesty. This, as is well known, has become the model of many succeeding painters. He has doubtless imitated earlier masters, but in a manner entirely characteristic of himself. On one occasion the Transfiguration of Raphael was evidently in his mind; but even while appropriating this, he infuses his own idea, and the hand of Christ is raised towards Moses as in the act of teaching.

The masterpiece of Agostino Caracci is without doubt his St. Jerome. The old man is on the very point of death: he has lost all power of movement, but aspires with his last breath in fervent longing towards the Host about to be presented to him.

The Ecce Homo of Annibale Caracci in the Borghese palace, with its deep shadows, its delicate transparent skin and tearful eyes, is the ideal of Lodovico, but raised to a more exalted sublimity. Admirably is this exemplified, once more, in the Dead Christ; the rigidity of death has not concealed the grandeur and freedom of conception that distinguish this fine work ; the tragical event just completed is expressed as it was conceived—with new and characteristic feeling.

These masters, then, though not refusing profane subjects, yet devoted themselves with peculiar earnestness to sacred ones ; they are not indebted wholly to their technical and external merits for the rank they maintain ; this is secured to them principally by the fact that they once more caught the full inspiration of their subject,—the religious representations they set before us had once more significance to themselves.

Their pupils are distinguished by a similar tendency. The ideal of St. Jerome, which Agostino Caracci had originated, was elaborated by Domenichino with such felicitous industry, that in variety of grouping and perfection of expression he has perhaps gone beyond his master. His head of St. Nilus appears to me a noble work, from its mingled expression, suffering and reflection. His Sibyls, too, how youthful and innocent, yet how profoundly meditative ! Domenichino delighted in contrasting the joys of heaven with the sufferings of earth, as we find them in his Madonna del Rosario—the divine mother, rich in grace and beauty, as opposed to the feeble and wretched mortal.

Guido Reni, also, has occasionally presented us with this contrast : the Virgin, radiant with immortal beauty, is placed together with monkish saints attenuated by fast and vigil. Guido displays vigorous force of conception and originality of manner. How sublime is his Judith, exulting in the deed she has accomplished, and glowing with gratitude for the aid bestowed by heaven ! Who but will remember his Madonnas—exalted—rapt in the ecstasy of their devotion ? Even in his saints he embodies an ideal of enthusiastic reverie.

Certain other characteristics of this tendency in art remain to be described, but are of less attractive quality. The invention of these painters is occasionally deformed by a fantastic incongruity. For example, we find a St. John ceremoniously kissing the foot of the Divine Infant introduced into the beautiful group of the Holy Family ; or the apostles are brought in to condole with the Virgin, and are deliberately preparing to wipe away their tears. The horrible, too, is expressed with needless frequency, and without the slightest mitigation. We have the St. Agnes of Domenichino, with the blood starting beneath the sword ! Guido has set the slaughter of the Innocents before us in all its atrocity,—the women with their mouths all open pouring forth shriek on shriek—the savage executioners whose hands are dyed with the blood of their victims !

Religion had resumed her empire over the minds of men, but the mode of her influence was no longer that of earlier times : in the older periods her external manifestations were pure and simple ; in this later epoch they became fantastic, forced, and conventional.

The talents of Guercino are admitted and admired by all, but what a St. John is that of the Sciarra gallery,—those large muscular arms, those bare gigantic knees,—that face too, inspired without doubt, but darkened by a gloom that makes it difficult to decide whether the inspiration be not rather of earth than heaven. His St. Thomas lays so heavy a hand on the wounds of Christ, that we fancy the Redeemer suffering from so rude a touch. Guercino has depicted Peter Martyr at the very moment when the sword cleaves his head. By the side of the duke of Aquitaine, whom St. Bernard is investing with the cowl, stands a monk, busily occupied with the conversion of a squire belonging to the duke, and the spectator is inexorably condemned to witness a scene of premeditated devotion.

This is not the place to inquire how far the limits of art were overstepped by this mode of treating the subject,—now extravagantly ideal, now unnaturally hard ; it will suffice to say, that over the restored art of painting the Church acquired complete dominion ;—by the inspirations of poetry, and the principles of a positive religion, she doubtless infused new life into it, but she also imposed on it a character essentially ecclesiastical, sacerdotal, and dogmatic.

This was effected with greater ease in architecture, which was more immediately vowed to her service. I am not certain that any one has investigated the progress of modern architecture, from the imitation of antiquity to the canon devised by Barozzi for the construction of churches, which has been observed in Rome and through all Catholic countries to the present day. Here, too, the lightness and cheerful freedom distinguishing the early part of the century were abandoned for pompous solemnity and religious magnificence.

As regarded one art only, did the question long remain doubtful whether or not it could be made subservient to the purposes of the Church.

This was music, which towards the middle of the sixteenth century had become lost in the most artificial intricacies. Variations, imitations, proportions, and fugues formed the reputation of composers; the meaning of the words was no more regarded. Masses of that period may be found in great number, of which the themes are furnished by well-known profane melodies. The human voice was treated as a mere instrument.¹

We cannot be surprised that the council of Trent should take offence at the introduction of music thus arranged in the churches. In consequence of the discussion there commenced, Pius IV appointed a commission to inquire into the subject, and to settle definitively whether music should be admitted to the divine service, or banished from it entirely. The decision was very doubtful. The Church required that the words sung should be intelligible, and that the musical expression should be in harmony with the sense. The professors of music asserted that this was unattainable, according to the rules of their art. Cardinal Borromeo was in the commission, and the known rigour of that eminent churchman rendered an adverse decision extremely probable.

Happily the right man once more presented himself, and he appeared at the right moment.

Among the Roman composers of that day was Pier-Luigi Palestrina. This master was married, and the severity of Paul IV had driven him on that account from the papal chapel. After his expulsion he lived retired and forgotten, in a wretched hut among the vineyards of Monte Celio.

¹ Giuseppe Baini, Memorie storico-critiche della Vita e delle Opere di Giovanni Pier-Luigi di Palestrina, Roma, 1828, supplies the information of which I have made use.

But his was a spirit that could not yield to adverse fortune. Even in this abandonment he devoted himself to his art with a singleness of purpose that secured the originality of his conceptions, and the free action of that creative force with which he was endowed. It was here that he wrote the "Improperia" which to this day ennoble the solemnities of Good Friday in the Sistine chapel. The profound significance of a scriptural text, its symbolic import, its power to move the soul, and its application to religion, have perhaps in no instance been more truly appreciated by any composer.

If the experiment, whether this method were applicable to the grand and comprehensive purposes of the mass, could be successfully made by any man, that man was Palestrina ; to him accordingly the commission intrusted it.

Deeply conscious that on this trial was now depending the life or death of the grand music of the mass, it was with earnest tension of all his powers that the composer proceeded to his task. The words "O Lord, open thou mine eyes," were found written on his manuscript.

His success was not immediate ; the first two attempts failed. At length, however, the happy moment arrived, and the mass known as the "Mass of Pope Marcellus" was completed. All expectation was far surpassed by this composition. Full of simple melody, it will yet bear comparison in rich variety with any work preceding it. Choruses separate and again blend. The meaning of the words received the most eloquent expression. The Kyrie is all submission, the Agnus humility, the Credo majesty. Pope Pius IV, before whom it was performed, was enchanted. He compared it with those heavenly melodies that St. John may have heard in his ecstatic trance.

The question was set at rest for ever by this one great example ; a path was opened, pursuing which, works the most beautiful and most touching, even to those who are not of the Roman creed, have been produced. Who can listen to them without enthusiasm ? Nature herself seems to have acquired voice and utterance ; it is as if the elements spoke ; and the tones breathing through universal life, poured forth in blended harmony of adoration ; now undulating, like the waves of the sea, now rising in songs of triumph to the skies.

Amidst the consenting sympathies of creation, the soul is borne upward to the region of religious entrancement.

It was precisely this art, at one time alienated more completely perhaps than any other from the Church and her service, that was now to become one of her most efficient handmaids. Few things could more effectually promote the interests of Catholicism. Even in its dogmas, the Church, if we are not mistaken, had embodied some portion of that enthusiasm and rêverie which form the leading characteristics of its devotional books. Spiritual sentimentality and rapture were favourite subjects for poetry and painting. Music, more direct, more penetrating, more resistless than any other exposition, or any other art, now embodied the prevailing tendency, in language more pure and appropriate, fascinating and subjecting the minds of men.

10. THE CURIA

While all the elements of social life and of intellectual activity were seized and transformed by the ecclesiastical spirit, the court of Rome, in which these varying elements met, was also greatly changed.

This change was remarked under Paul IV, and it was essentially promoted by the example of Pius V. Under Gregory XIII it became palpable to all. "Several pontiffs in succession have been men of blameless lives," says Paolo Tiepolo in 1576, "and this has contributed immeasurably to the welfare of the Church; for all other men have become better, or at least have assumed the appearance of being so. Cardinals and prelates attend diligently at the mass; their households are careful to avoid whatever might give offence. The whole city has indeed put off its former recklessness of manner. People are all much more Christian-like in life and habit than they formerly were. It may even be safely affirmed, that in matters of religion, Rome is not far from as high a degree of perfection as human nature is permitted to attain."

Nor are we by any means to conclude that the court was composed of demure hypocrites or feigned puritans. It was formed, on the contrary, of distinguished men; but these men had in a high degree assimilated themselves to the rigorous tone of manner and opinion prevailing in the Church.

If we represent to ourselves the papal court as it existed under Sixtus V, we find many among its cardinals who had taken a considerable share in the politics of the world. Gallio of Como had conducted the affairs of state as prime minister during two pontificates, and possessed the art of governing by address and pliancy. He was now distinguished by the ecclesiastical endowments his large revenues enabled him to establish. Rusticucci, powerful under Pius V, was not without influence under Sixtus; laborious in his habits, of penetrating mind, and endowed with cordial kindness of heart, he was, perhaps, rendered more circumspect and irreproachable in his life, by the hope he entertained of the papal throne. Salviati had gained reputation by his conscientious government of Bologna; simple and blameless, his manners were not merely serious, they were austere. Santorio, cardinal of Santa Severina, the man of the Inquisition, long commanding influence on all questions of ecclesiastical polity, was inflexible in opinion, rigorous to his servants, severe even towards his own family, still more so towards others, and harshly cold and inaccessible to all. In contrast to him stood Madruzzi, always deep in the counsels and secrets of Austria, whether of the German or Spanish lines, and called the Cato of the college; but with reference to his learning and unclouded virtues only, not to any censoriousness or arrogance, for he was modesty itself. Sirleto also was still living; beyond question the most profoundly skilled in science, and the most accomplished linguist of all the cardinals of his time. Muret calls him a living library; yet, when he rose from his books, he would gather around him the poor boys who were carrying a few fagots of wood to the market, give them religious instruction, and then buy their wood. He was, indeed, a most kindly and compassionate man.¹ The example of

¹ Ciaconius, Vitae Paparum, iii. p. 978. He also gives the epitaph of Sirleto, where he is described as "eruditorum pauperumque

Carlo Borromeo, who was afterwards canonized, could not fail to exert great influence. Federigo Borromeo was by nature impetuous and irritable; but, influenced by his uncle, he led a religious life, and did not permit the mortifications that he frequently experienced to deprive him of his self-command. But he who most resembled the excellent archbishop of Milan was Agostino Valiere, a man whose nature was pure and noble, as his learning was extraordinary. Following implicitly the plan prescribed by his conscience, he had now arrived at extreme old age, and presented a true type of a bishop of the primitive Church.

The remainder of the prelates were careful to regulate their lives by the pattern they received from the cardinals, whose associates they were in the congregation, and whose seats they were one day to occupy.

There were also two men who distinguished themselves highly among the members of the supreme tribunal, the Auditori di Rota. These were Mantica and Arigone, men of equal talent, but of characters entirely opposite. Mantica lived only among books and legal documents; his works on jurisprudence were of authority in the forum and the schools; his manners and address were unstudied and abrupt. Arigone, on the contrary, devoted less time to books, than to the world, the court, and public affairs. He was remarkable for the acuteness of his judgment, and the flexibility of his character; but neither of these men yielded to the other in efforts to maintain a high reputation for purity and sanctity of life. Among the bishops about the court, those who had been much employed in legations, were especially noticed; as, for example, Torres, who had taken active part in concluding the league that Pius V formed with Spain and Venice against the Turks; Malaspina, who had carefully watched over the interests of Catholicism in Germany and the north; Bolognetti, to whom had been intrusted the arduous visitation of the Venetian churches; all men whose talents and zeal for religion had procured them distinction. Men of learning held a very eminent place in the Roman court: Bellarmine, professor, grammarian, and the most powerful patronus." Cardella's Memorie storiche de' Cardinali contains nothing but the notices of Ciaconius translated into Italian.

controversialist of the Catholic church, whose memory is held in reverence for the apostolic purity of his life; another Jesuit, Maffei, who wrote a history of the Portuguese conquests in India, with particular reference to the effect produced by them on the diffusion of Christianity through the south and east. He is also the author of a life of Loyola, every phrase laboured with the most deliberate prolixity and most studied elegance.¹ Distinguished foreigners were also to be found here; as the German Clavius, who combined profound learning with purity of life, and was the object of universal respect; or Muret, a Frenchman, and the best Latinist of his day. He passed a large part of his life in expounding the Pandects; which he did in an original and classic manner. Muret was famed for wit as well as eloquence; yet, in his old age, he took orders, said mass every day, and devoted the close of his existence to the study of theology. Here also was the Spanish canonist, Azpilcueta, whose "responsa" were received as oracles, not in Rome only, but throughout the Catholic world. Pope Gregory would sometimes pass hours in conversation with Azpilcueta, pausing to talk with him before the door of his house, while, at the same time, the Spaniard humbly performed the lowest offices in the hospitals.

But, among these remarkable personages, few acquired so deep and extensive an influence as Filippo Neri, founder of the congregation of the Oratory. This eminent confessor and guide of souls, was of cheerful temper and playful manners; rigid in essentials, he was most indulgent in matters of mere form; it was not his custom to command, but only to advise, or, perhaps, to request. Agreeable and easy of access, he did not lecture or harangue,—he conversed. He possessed a penetration that enabled him to discriminate the peculiar bent of every mind. His oratory grew up gradually from visits paid him by young men, whose attachment to his person and teaching made them desire to live with him as his disciples. The most renowned among these is the annalist of the Church, Caesar Baronius. Perceiving his talents, Filippo Neri induced him to give lectures on ecclesiastical history in the Oratory.¹ For this occupation, Baronius shewed but little inclination in the first instance, but he none the less applied himself to it during thirty years; and even when called to the college of cardinals, he rose constantly before daylight to continue his labours. His meals were taken regularly at the same table with his whole household; humility and piety were displayed in his every action. Baronius was bound in the closest friendship with Tarugi, who was of great eminence as a preacher and confessor, in the college of cardinals, as in the Oratory. This intimacy made the happiness of these eminent men; the life of Tarugi being equally pure and irreproachable as that of his friend; death only interrupted this affection, and they were buried side by side. Silvio Antoniano was also a disciple of Filippo Neri. His early dispositions were rather towards poetry and literature; he distinguished himself in both; and when he was afterwards intrusted with the preparation of papal briefs, they were composed in a manner unusually skilful and elegant. He too was remarkable for kindness of heart, modest affability of demeanour, pure truthfulness, and exalted piety.

¹ Vita J. P. Maffei, Serassio Auctore. In the edition of Maffei's Works; Berg. 1747.

All who rose to eminence in the papal court at this time, whether in the state, the law, poetry, learning, or art, exhibited the same characteristics.

How widely does all this differ from the Curia of the earlier part of the century! Then the cardinals lived in continual contest with the popes, who on their part buckled on the sword, and banished from their court and person whatever could remind them of their Christian vocation. How still, how cloister-like, were now the lives of the cardinals. The failure of Cardinal Tosco, who was once on the point of being elected pope, was principally occasioned by his use of certain proverbs, current in Lombardy, but which were found offensive by the delicacy of Rome; so exclusive was the tendency of the public mind, so sensitive were now its ideas of decorum.

We are nevertheless compelled to admit that a different aspect of things, and one much less consonant with our notions of right, was exhibited in social habits, no less than in art and literature. Miracles, which had not been heard of for a long time, were revived. An image of the Virgin began to speak in the church of San Silvestro, and this event produced so powerful an impression upon the people, that the region around the church, hitherto neglected and desolate, was presently covered with dwellings. In the Rione de' Monti, a miraculous image of the Virgin appeared in a haystack; and the people of the district considered this so especial a token of divine favour, that they rose in arms to prevent its removal. Similar wonders appeared at Narni, Todi, San Severino, and other parts of the ecclesiastical states, whence they gradually extended over all Catholic countries. The pontiffs also resumed the practice of canonization, which had been suffered to fall into disuse. Nor were all confessors so judicious and moderate as Filippo Neri; hollow unprofitable works of sanctity were encouraged, and fantastic superstitions were mingled with the representation of things sacred and divine.

¹ Gallonius, Vita Phil. Nerii; Mog. 1602; p. 163.

There would be consolation in the belief, that together with these mistaken ideas, the majority had acquired a sincere devotion to the precepts of religion.

But from the very nature of this court it resulted inevitably, that the most eager struggle after worldly greatness was mingled with the general effort to promote religious interests.

The Curia was not an ecclesiastical institution only, it was a political government also, and had indirectly to rule a large part of the world in addition to its own state. In proportion as men acquired part in the exercise of this power, they also acquired consideration, riches, influence, and whatever else can best excite the wish of man. Human nature could not so entirely change as that men should limit themselves to spiritual weapons alone in their efforts to attain the great prizes of social life and of the state. Matters proceeded in Rome as in other courts, but with very peculiar modifications imposed by the nature of the arena.

The population of Rome was then more fluctuating probably than that of any city in the world. Under Leo X it had risen to more than eighty thousand souls. The severe measures of Paul IV drove so many to flight, that in his pontificate it sank to forty-five thousand. In a few years after his death it was found to be increased to seventy thousand; and under Sixtus V it rose to more than one hundred thousand; the most peculiar circumstance was that the fixed residents bore no proportion to these numbers. To few of its inhabitants was the city a home, their abode in it was rather a long sojourn than a permanent citizenship. It might be said to resemble a fair or diet, having no stability or fixed continuance, no connecting links of family or kindred. Many were there simply because no road to preferment was open to them in the land of their birth; wounded pride drove one man thither, boundless ambition impelled another; some came believing they found more liberty in Rome than elsewhere. But the grand object of all was to advance their own interest in their own manner.

These varying classes did not become amalgamated into one body, the different races were still so distinct that the diversities of national and provincial character were clearly perceptible. The courteous and observant Lombard was readily distinguished from the Genoese, who expected to accomplish all things by his money. Nor was it difficult to discover the Venetian, ever occupied in seeking to penetrate the secrets of others. The frugal and talkative Florentine met here with the sagacious Romagnese, whose eyes were ever bent with instinctive prudence on the path by which his interests might best be secured. The ceremonious and exacting Neapolitan came, together with the simply-mannered native of the North, remarked for his love of comfort; even the learned German Clavius was the subject of many a jest, provoked by the abundance of his two substantial breakfasts. The Frenchman kept himself much apart, and relinquished his national habits with more difficulty than any others. The Spaniard, full of personal pretension and projects of ambition, stalked onward, wrapping his cloak about him, and casting looks of scorn on all the rest.

In this court there was no position so eminent, but the most obscure individual might aspire to hold it. People delighted to recall the words of John XXIII, who, being asked why he was going to Rome, said "he meant to be pope," and pope he became. It was from a station among the humblest that Pius V and Sixtus V had been exalted to the supreme dignity. Each man believed himself capable of all, and hoped for every thing.

It was a remark frequently made in those days, and a perfectly just one, that there was a sort of republicanism in the character of the Prelacy and Curia; this consisted in the circumstance that all might aspire to all; examples were continually presented of men whose origin was most obscure, attaining to positions of the first eminence. The constitution of this republic was nevertheless very singular; to the undisputed rights of the many stood opposed the absolute power of one, from whose arbitrary decision it was that all promotion and every advantage must be derived. And who was this one? It was he who, by some combination, on which it was impossible to calculate, had come forth as victor from the conflict of election. Of small importance hitherto, he was suddenly invested with the supreme authority. Persuaded that he had been raised by the Holy Spirit to this height of dignity, he was but slightly tempted to dissemble his disposition and inclination; thus the pontificate usually commenced with a complete change in all public offices. Legates and governors of provinces were removed. There were certain appointments in the capital that fell as matters of course to the nephews or other kinsmen of the reigning pope; for even when nepotism was under restraint, as was the case in the times we are describing, there was no pontiff who did not promote his immediate confidants and old adherents; he would naturally feel indisposed to resign the society of those with whom he had previously been passing his life. The secretary who had long served Cardinal Montalto was most acceptable to that prelate when he became Sixtus V. The adherents of their opinions also were sure to be brought forward by each new pope. Thus every accession to the papal chair caused a perfect change in all prospects and expectations; in the approaches to power, and in ecclesiastical no less than in temporal dignities. Commendone compares the state of things appearing on a new pontificate, to "a city in which the palace of the sovereign had been transferred to a new site, and all the streets turned towards this new centre. How many abodes must be demolished! How often must the road be carried through a palace; new passages are opened, and thoroughfares hitherto unfrequented are enlivened by the crowd." The alterations taking place on these occasions, and the degree of stability possessed by the new arrangements, are not unaptly typified by this description.

But from these peculiarities there necessarily resulted a consequence very singular in its character.

From the fact that a pope attained the sovereignty when much older than other monarchs, these mutations were so frequent, that a new change might at any moment be expected. The government might be instantly placed in other hands. This made people live as in a perpetual game of chance, wherein nothing could be calculated, but everything might be hoped for.

To attain promotion, to gain advancement, as every one desired and trusted to do, this would depend on the degree of personal favour that each could command; but where all personal influence was in so perpetual a fluctuation, the calculations of ambition must necessarily assume a similar character, and sometimes employ very extraordinary devices.

Among our manuscript collections we find a multitude of regulations for the conduct of those who are sent to the papal court.¹ The varying modes in which each man pursues fortune, present us with a subject not unworthy of observation. Inexhaustible is the plasticity of human nature; the more rigid the limits by which it is restrained, so much the more unexpected are the forms into which it throws itself.

¹ For instance: Istruttione al signor cardinal di Medici, del modo come si deve governare nella corte di Roma.—Avvertimenti all' ill^{mo} cardinal Montalto sopra il modo col quale si possa e debba ben governare come cardinale e nepote del papa. Inform. XII.—Avvertimenti politici et utilissimi per la corte di Roma: 78 maxims of very questionable morality. Inform. XXV.—The most important: Discorso over ritratto della corte di Roma di M^r Ill^{mo} Commendone. Codd. Rang. at Vienna, XVIII.

It is manifest that all could not pursue the same path. The man who possessed nothing must be content to forward himself by rendering service to him who had means. A liberal domestication in the houses of princes, secular or temporal, was still accepted by literary men. Whoever was compelled to adopt this mode of life, must then make it his first object to ingratiate himself with the head of the house, to gain merit in his eyes, to penetrate his secrets, and in some way to render himself indispensable to his lord. For this all indignities must be endured, no injustice must be resented. For who could say how soon a change in the papacy might cause the star of his master to rise in the ascendant, and its lustre to be poured on the servant? Fortune ebbs and flows; the man remains the same.

Or to some of those aspirants, the possession of a subordinate office was perhaps the object of desire. From this they might advance to better employments by the exercise of zeal and activity. It was, nevertheless, in Rome as elsewhere, and in those times as in all others, a very critical and dangerous thing to be compelled to consider interest in the first place, and honour only in the second.

Much more favourable was the position of those who had the means of life. The monti, in which they purchased shares, gave them a certain income every month. They bought a place by means of which they immediately entered the prelacy; not only attaining an independence, but also acquiring an opportunity for the brilliant display of their talents. To him that hath shall be given. At the Roman court the possession of property was doubly advantageous; for since this possession reverted to the treasury, the pope himself had an interest in granting promotions.

This state of things did not demand servility of attachment to any one great man; on the contrary, an adherence too earnestly declared might prove an impediment to promotion, if fortune should not happen to be favourable. The grand essential was to beware of making enemies, to give no offence. This precaution was to be departed from in no circumstance of social intercourse, however slight or trivial. It was essential, for example, to offer no man more honour than he was strictly entitled to claim; equality of deportment towards persons of different degrees would be inequality, and might produce an unfavourable impression. Even of the absent, nothing but good was to be spoken, not only because words once uttered are beyond our control, and we know not whither they are borne, but also because few love too keen an observer. If a man possess extended acquirements, let him be moderate in displaying them; and above all, let him never permit them to become tedious. It is not prudent to be the bearer of bad news; the unpleasant impression they make recoils on him who brings them; but in regard to this, there is an error to be avoided; that of maintaining a silence so rigid as would make its motive apparent.

The elevation to higher dignities, even to that of cardinal, conferred no exemption from these observances; they were to be fulfilled with increased caution in his own sphere. Who could venture to betray a conviction that one member of the sacred college was less worthy than another to ascend the papal throne? There was none so obscure that the choice might not fall on him.

It was above all important that a cardinal should cultivate the good-will of the reigning pontiff. Fortune and dignity, universal deference and obsequiousness follow him who has gained this. But more than ever must he be cautious while seeking it; profound silence was to be maintained with regard to the personal interests of the pope, but these must nevertheless be secretly penetrated, and the conduct governed accordingly. It was permitted occasionally to magnify the kinsmen of the pontiff, their fidelity and talents might be lauded; this was for the most part an acceptable subject. To arrive at the secrets of the papal family, it was expedient to employ the monks; these men, availing themselves of religious duties as their pretext, contrive to penetrate further than is possible to any other class of the community.

Ambassadors are imperatively called on by the rapid vicissitudes and extensive importance of personal relations, for the most vigilant watchfulness. Like a skilful pilot, the envoy is attentive to mark from what quarter blows the wind; he must spare no cost to assure himself of those who possess good information, certain that his utmost expenditure would be largely repaid by one single piece of intelligence that enabled him to seize the moment favourable to his negotiation. If he had to present a request to the pontiff, he made incredible efforts imperceptibly to interweave some point that the pope himself desired to carry, with the business he was labouring to promote. Most of all did he seek to gain the favourite nephew or other kinsman to his wishes, by persuading him that more permanent and more important advantages, whether of riches or greatness, were to be obtained from his court than from any other. Neither must he neglect to secure the good will of the cardinals. He would not promise the papacy to any, but all were to be allured by the hope of it. He displayed devotion to none; but even for those most inimical to his purposes, he would occasionally perform some act of favour. He resembled the falconer, who shews the piece of meat to the hawk, but gives it him in small quantities only; and that morsel by morsel.

Thus did they live, and such was the policy of the ecclesiastical court. Cardinals, ambassadors, prelates, princes, those who were the known possessors of power, and those who exercised it in secret. Full of ceremony, of which Rome was the classic soil, of submissive subordination, and reverential observance; but egoists to the very core, all eagerly seeking to attain some object, to accomplish some purpose, to achieve some advantage over a neighbour.

Strange that the struggle for what all desire,—power, honour, riches, enjoyment,—elsewhere the fruitful source of rancorous feuds, should here assume the aspect of a courteous anxiety to serve. Here every man flattered the hope of his rival, conscious that he nourished something similar, for the purpose of arriving at the possession of what he also was seeking to obtain. Here self-denial was full of eagerness to enjoy, and passion stole onward with cautious footstep.

We have seen the dignity, the seriousness, the religious zeal prevailing in the Roman court, we have also remarked its worldly aspect, ambition, avarice, dissimulation, and craft.

If it were our purpose to pronounce the eulogy of the papal see, we should have insisted on the first only of the two elements composing it. Were we disposed to inveigh against it, we should have displayed only the second; but whoever will raise himself to the level, whence a clear and unprejudiced view can be obtained, will arrive at an exact perception of the whole subject; he will see both these elements, but he will also perceive that both are rendered inevitable by the nature of man and the condition of things.

The period of the world's history that we have just been considering, was one wherein the prevalent mode of opinion made pressing demand for external propriety, purity of life, and religious fervour. This state of public feeling coincided with the principle of the court, the position of which, as regards the rest of the world, was determined by these qualities. It followed of necessity that power and eminence were most certainly secured by men whose characters were in accordance with this demand. Were it otherwise, public opinion would not only be untrue to itself, it would destroy its own existence. But that the advantages of fortune should happen to be so immediately consequent on the possession of spiritual qualities, is indeed the most seductive allurement that could be offered by the spirit of this world.

We cannot doubt the sincerity of these qualities and sentiments, as not unfrequently described by our observant and discreet authorities. But how many monks conformed to them in appearance for the furtherance of their fortunes! In others the worldly tendencies may have insinuated themselves struggling, in the dim uncertainty of motives imperfectly developed, with those of more lofty import.

The process we have seen taking place in art and literature may be traced also in the Curia. Here also a desertion from what the Church demands was most apparent; there was a laxity approaching to paganism in the modes of thought prevailing. But the march of events re-awakened the principle of the Church, aroused the energies of society as with a new breath of life, and imparted an altered tone to the existence of the times. How broad is the difference between Ariosto and Tasso, Giulio Romano and Guercino, Pomponazzo and Patrizi! A vast epoch lies between them. They have, nevertheless, something in common, and the later is linked by certain points of contact with the earlier. With its ancient forms the Curia also retained many component parts of its old nature, yet this did not prevent it from being animated by a new spirit. What could not be wholly transferred and assimilated to itself, was at least urged forward by the force of the impulse which that spirit communicated.

While occupied in contemplation of these commingling elements, I recall to mind a scene of nature, that may serve to bring this state of things more vividly before us by the similitude it presents.

At Terni, the Nera is seen tranquilly approaching through wood and field, it proceeds across the distant valley in calm unruffled course; from the other side comes rushing the Velino, pressed between opposing rocks, and foaming onward with resistless speed, till at length its mass of waters are dashed down headlong in magnificent falls that sparkle and glitter with a myriad changing hues. These reach the peaceful Nera; they at once communicate their own wild commotion, raging and foaming, and the mingled waters then rush forward on their eager and hurried course.

It was thus that the whole being of society, all literature, and every art, received a new impulse from the re-awakened spirit of the Catholic church. The Curia was at once devout and restless, spiritual and warlike; on the one side replete with dignity, pomp, and ceremony; on the other, unparalleled for calculating subtlety, and insatiable love of power: its piety and ambition, reposing on the idea of an exclusive orthodoxy, coincide, and act in harmony for the production of an end—universal domination. The Roman church once more binds on her armour for the conquest of the world.

BOOK V

COUNTER REFORMATION

FIRST PERIOD, 1563-1589

COUNTER REFORMATION

FIRST PERIOD, 1563-1589

IN the history of a nation or power, there is no problem more difficult than that of appreciating correctly the connection of its particular relations with those of the world in general.

It is true that the individual life of a nation is determined by causes peculiar to itself, inherent in its nature, and displaying a characteristic consistency through all ages. But each community is subjected to the action of general influences, by which its progress is powerfully affected.

In this conflict of forces it is, that the character presented by modern Europe may be said to have its basis. Nations and states are separated eternally, on certain points of their existence, but at the same time are knit together in indissoluble community. There is no national history, of which universal history does not form an important portion. So necessary in itself, so all-embracing is the consecutive series of events through a lapse of ages, that even the most powerful state appears but as a member of the universal commonwealth, involved in and ruled by its destinies. Whoever has earnestly sought to comprehend the history of any people as a whole, to contemplate its progress without prejudice or illusion, will have experienced the difficulties arising from this cause. In the several crises of a nation's progressive existence, we discern the different currents that form the sum of human destiny.

The difficulty is doubled, when, as sometimes occurs, a great movement, agitating the whole world, is originated by an individual power, which then constitutes itself the special representative of the principle actuating that movement. The power thus in action, then takes so influential a part in the collective operations of the century, it enters into relations so intimate with all the powers of the world, that its history, in a certain sense, expands into universal history. Such was the epoch upon which the papacy entered at the close of the council of Trent.

Convulsed to its centre, endangered in the very groundwork of its being, it had not only maintained itself, but found means to gain renewed force. In the two southern peninsulas, all influences hostile to its ascendancy had been promptly expelled, all the elements of thought and action had been once more gathered to itself, and pervaded by its own spirit. It now conceived the idea of subduing the revolted in all parts of the world. Rome once more became a conquering power, projects were formed and enterprises engaged in, recalling those proceeding from the Seven Hills in ancient times and during the middle ages.

The history of the renovated papacy would be but imperfectly understood, did we limit our attention to its centre only. Its essential importance is best perceived by observing its operations on the world in general.

Let us begin by taking a review of the strength and position of its opponents.

I. STATE OF PROTESTANTISM ABOUT THE YEAR 1563

On the north of the Alps and Pyrenees, the opinions of Protestantism had made vigorous and unceasing progress, up to the time when the council of Trent closed its last sittings; they extended their dominion far and wide over the Germanic and Slavonic nations.

Among the Scandinavian races, the tenets of the Protestants had established themselves all the more immutably from the fact that their introduction was coincident with that of new dynasties and with the consequent re-modelling of all political institutions. They were received with delight from the very first, as if they bore in their nature some natural affinity with the national disposition. Bugenhagen, the founder of Lutheranism in Denmark, can find no words that suffice to depict the enthusiasm with which his sermons were listened to: "Even on work-days," as he expresses it, "from the first gleam of day the people were eagerly waiting, and on holidays they were in attendance through the whole day."¹ Protestant tenets had now made their way to the most remote countries. It is not known by what agency the Farøe islands were rendered Protestant, so easily was the change effected.² In Iceland the last representatives of Catholicism had disappeared by the year 1552, and a Lutheran bishopric was founded at Wyborg in 1554. The Swedish governors were accompanied by Lutheran preachers to the most distant shores of Lapland. Gustavus Vasa exhorts his heirs, in his will, made in 1560, to hold fast by the evangelical doctrines, to inculcate the same on their most remote successors, and to admit no false teachers. He makes this almost a condition to the inheritance of the crown.³

On the opposite coast of the Baltic also Lutheran opinions were predominant; at least, among such of the inhabitants as used the German tongue. Prussia had given the first example of secularizing Church property on a grand scale; this was followed by Livonia, in 1561; the first condition made by the province on its submission to Poland was, that it should be at liberty to abide by the Confession of Augsburg. The connection of the Jagellon kings with countries whose adherence to their rule was secured only by the maintenance of Protestant principles, was a check on those princes, which prevented their opposing any determined resistance to the progress of Lutheran tenets. The more important cities of Prussian-Poland were confirmed in the exercise of their religion, according to the Lutheran ritual, by express charters granted in the years 1557 and 1558. The smaller towns received privileges yet more explicit some short time after, they being more exposed to attacks from the powerful bishops.¹ A large body of the nobles in Poland Proper had been won over to the Protestant confession, which they found more in harmony with the feeling of independence awakened and maintained by the constitution of their states. "A Polish noble is not subject to the king—shall he then be subject to the pope?" was the question they asked. Things went so far in this country, that Protestants gained possession of episcopal sees; and, under Sigismund Augustus, they had even obtained the majority in the senate. That sovereign was undoubtedly Catholic, he heard mass daily and a Catholic sermon every Sunday; he even joined the singers of his choir in the Benedictus. He confessed regularly, and received the sacrament in one kind; but the creeds that might be prevalent in his court or kingdom seemed but little to disturb his quiet, nor did he show any disposition to embitter the close of his life by a contest with opinions making so vigorous a progress.²

¹ Narrative of D. Pomerani, 1539: Sabb. p. visit., in Müller's Entdecktes Staatscabinet, 4te Eröffn. p. 365.

² Münter: Kirchengeschichte von Dänemark, iii. 529.

³ Testamentum religiosum Gustavi I, in Baaz: Inventarium Ecclesiae Sueogoth., p. 282.

An attempt at opposition of this kind had certainly produced no very encouraging results in the neighbouring dominions of Hungary. The diet had constantly refused to pass the resolutions unfavourable to Protestant opinions that were pressed on it from time to time by Ferdinand I. In the year 1554, a Lutheran was elected palatine of the empire, and concessions were soon afterwards extorted in favour of the Helvetic confession in the valley of Erlau. Transylvania was altogether separated from the Catholic church, the ecclesiastical possessions in that country were confiscated by a formal decree of the diet, and the Princess even appropriated the greater part of the tithes.

We next come to Germany, where the new form of the church had taken its origin from the peculiar constitution of the national mind, had maintained itself through long and perilous wars, had achieved a legal existence in the empire, and was now in the act of occupying the various territories that divided the country. Already this process had been in great measure accomplished. In North Germany, where the Protestant tenets had taken rise, they were entirely paramount; they had gained permanent ascendancy in those districts of Southern Germany wherein they had been early introduced, and had besides extended their influence far and wide beyond these limits.

¹ Lengnich: Nachricht von der Religionsänderung in Preussen; prefixed to the fourth part of the Geschichte der Preussischen Lande, § 20.

² Relatione di Polonia del Vescovo di Camerino, about 1555. A MS. of the Chigi Library. "A molti di questi (people of the court) comporta che vivano come li piace, perche si vede che S. Maestà è tanto benigna che non vorria mai far cosa che dispiacesse ad alcuno, ed io vorrei che nelle cose della religione fosse un poco piu severa."

The bishops vainly set themselves to oppose their progress in Franconia. In Würzburg and Bamberg, the greater part of the nobility, and even the episcopal authorities, had passed over to the reformed church; the majority of the magistrates and burghers of the towns, with the whole mass of the people, held similar opinions. In the bishopric of Bamberg, we find the name of a Lutheran preacher in almost every parish.¹ A Protestant spirit predominated in the government, which was principally in the hands of the estates,—bodies corporate, regularly constituted, and possessing the right of imposing taxes; nearly all offices of the law courts were in like manner held by Protestants, and it was observed that their decisions were very commonly adverse to Catholic interests.² The bishops retained very little influence, even those who, "with old German and Frankish fidelity," still honoured the secular prince in their persons, could no longer endure to see them robed in their clerical ornaments, and crowned with the mitre.

No less energetic were the proceedings of Protestantism in Bavaria. Here, too, the new faith had been adopted by a large body of the nobles: a considerable number of the towns was equally inclined towards these doctrines. In the assembly of his states, for example, of the year 1556, the duke was compelled to make concessions which had elsewhere led to the exclusive adoption of the Confession of Augsburg, and which here also promised the same result. The duke himself was not so decidedly opposed to the new doctrines, but that he would occasionally listen to a Protestant sermon.¹

¹ Jack has occupied himself much with this matter in the 2nd and 3rd volumes of his History of Bamberg.

² Gropp, Dissertatio de Statu Religionis in Franconia Lutheranism infecta. Scriptores Wirceb. i. p. 42.

Far more than this had been gained in Austria. The nobility of that country pursued their studies at Wittenberg, the colleges of the country were filled with Protestants, and it was calculated, that not more than a thirtieth part of the population remained Catholic. A national constitution was gradually formed, which was based on the principles of Protestantism.

Enclosed between Bavaria and Austria, the archbishops of Salzburg had been unable to maintain their territories in obedience to the Catholic rule. They did not as yet endure the presence of Lutheran preachers, but the disposition of the people was none the less explicitly declared. Mass was no longer attended in the capital, nor were fasts solemnized or festivals observed; those whose dwellings were too far removed from the preachers of the Austrian localities bordering on their country, remained at home, reading for their edification from the homilies and scriptural commentaries of Spangenberg. This did not satisfy the people of the hill-country. In the Rauris, and the Gastein, in St. Veit, Tamsweg, and Radstadt, the inhabitants loudly demanded the sacramental cup; this being refused, they abandoned the communion altogether. They no longer sent their children to school; and, on one occasion, a peasant rose up in the church, and called aloud to the priest, "Thou liest." The country people began to preach to each other.² We need feel no surprise, if the privation of all worship in accordance with their newly-adopted convictions, should give rise to notions the most visionary and fantastic, among the inhabitants of those Alpine solitudes.

Advantageously contrasted with this state of things, is that which presents itself as existing in the territories of the ecclesiastical electors on the Rhine. Here the nobles possessed independence, which enabled them to secure a degree of religious liberty for their vassals beyond what could have been granted by a spiritual prince. The

¹ Sitzinger in Strobel's Beiträge zur Literatur, i. 313.

² Extract from a Report of the Canon Wilh. von Trautmannsdorf of the year 1555, in Zauner's Chronicle of Salzburg, vi. 327.

Rhenish nobles had early received the Protestant doctrines, and permitted the spiritual sovereign to make no encroachments, even of a religious character, on their domains. In all the towns there now existed a Protestant party. In Cologne its activity was displayed by reiterated petitions. It became so powerful in Trier as to send for a Protestant preacher from Geneva, and maintain him in defiance of the elector. In Aix-la-Chapelle the Lutheran party made direct efforts to obtain the supremacy. The citizens of Mainz did not scruple to send their children to Protestant schools, those of Nuremberg, for example. Commendone, who was in Germany in 1561, can find no words to describe the servility of the prelates to the Lutheran princes, and the concessions they made to Protestantism.¹ He thought he could perceive that there were Protestants of the most violent opinions even in the privy councils,² and expresses amazement that time should have done so little in aid of Catholicism.

In a similar manner affairs proceeded throughout Westphalia. On St. Peter's day the country people were engaged with the labours of their harvest; the fast-days commanded by the canon were no longer observed. In Paderborn, the town-council watched, with a kind of jealousy, over its Protestant confession. More than one bishop of Münster was disposed to the new creed; and the priests were, for the most part, publicly married. Duke William of Cleves adhered, on the whole, to the Catholic faith, but in his private chapel he received the communion in both kinds. The greater part of his council were avowed Protestants; nor did the evangelical form of worship experience any effectual hindrance in his dominions.³

¹ Gratana, Vie de Commendone, p. 116.

² "De' piu arrabbiati heretici.—Mi è parso che il tempo non habbia apportato alcun giovamento." Commendone, Relatione dello Stato della Religione in Germania: MS. Vallicelli. (See Appendix No. 38.)

³ Tempesti, Vita di Sisto V; from the Anonimo di Campidoglio., i. xxiii.: "Da molt' anni si comunicava con ambe le specie, quantunque il suo capellano glien' havesse parlato inducendolo a comunicarsi cosi nella sua capella segreta per non dar mal esempio a' sudditi." [For many years he communicated in both kinds, but his chaplain had induced him to receive the sacrament in his private chapel, so as not to

We have said enough to show, that Protestantism had gained a decided ascendancy through Germany, from the east to the west, and from the north to the south. The nobles had, from the first, enrolled themselves in its ranks; the public functionaries, already numerous and highly respected, were trained up in the new creed; the common people would hear no more of certain articles once insisted on as matters of faith,—the doctrine of purgatory, for example,—nor of certain ceremonies, such as pilgrimages; no convent could maintain itself, and none dared to exhibit the relics of saints. A Venetian ambassador calculated, in the year 1558, that a tenth part only of the German people still adhered to the ancient religion.

The losses sustained by the Catholic church in riches and power were no less important than those suffered by her spiritual influence. The canons in nearly all the bishoprics were either attached to the reformed tenets, or were but lukewarm and indifferent Catholics. What should prevent them from proposing Protestant bishops, should it appear to them advantageous in other respects? It was without doubt decreed by the peace of Augsburg, that a spiritual prince should lose both his rank and revenues on departing from the Catholic faith, but this ordinance was not believed capable of restraining a chapter which had become Protestant from electing a Protestant bishop. All that could be insisted on was that the benefice should not be made hereditary. It thus happened that a prince of Brandenburg obtained the archbishopric of Magdeburg, a prince of Lauenburg that of Bremen, and a prince of Brunswick that of Halberstadt. The bishopric of Lübeck, also, with those of Verden and Minden, fell into the hands of Protestants, as did the abbey of Quedlinburg.¹

The confiscation of Church property proceeded with proportionate rapidity. How important were the losses set a bad example to his subjects.] In a letter given in Niesert's Müntersche Urkundensammlung, i. xxi., the same thing is said of the bishop of Münster and the court of Cleves. "Wilhelmus episcopus (W. von Kettler) religionem semilutheranam hausit in aula Juliaciensi."

¹ See also my essay "Ueber die Zeiten Ferdinands I and Maximilians II": Hist. Pol. Zeitschrift, i. 269, et seq.

sustained, for example, in very few years, by the bishopric of Augsburg! All the convents of Würtemberg were wrested from it in the year 1557. These were followed in 1558 by the convents and parishes of the county of Oettingen. After the peace of Augsburg, the Protestants gained an equality with their rivals of the ancient faith in Dünkelsbühl and Donauwerth; in Nördlingen and Memmingen they acquired the supremacy. The convents of these towns, and among them the rich preceptory of St. Anthony in Memmingen, with the parochial benefices, were then irretrievably lost.¹

In addition to this came the circumstance that the prospects of Catholicism were by no means encouraging as regarded the future.

Protestant opinions were predominant in the universities and other schools: the old champions of Catholicism, who had taken the field against Luther, and distinguished themselves in religious controversy, were either dead or far advanced in years, and no young men competent to occupy their places had arisen. Twenty years had elapsed since any student in the university of Vienna had taken priests' orders. Even in Ingolstadt, which was so pre-eminently Catholic, no-qualified candidates of the faculty of theology presented themselves for those important offices that hitherto had always been filled by ecclesiastics.² The city of Cologne established a school with endowments, but when all the arrangements were completed, it appeared that the new regent was a Protestant.³ A university was founded by Cardinal Otto Truchsess in his town of Dillingen, for the express purpose of opposing resistance to the Protestant opinions. It flourished for some years under the care of certain eminent Spanish theologians, but when these had departed, no learned Catholics could be found to take their places, which were at once occupied by Protestants. At this period the teachers in Germany were Protestant with very few exceptions: all the youth of the country sat at their feet, and imbibed hatred of the pope with the first rudiments of learning.

¹ Placidus Braun : Geschichte der Bischöfe von Augsburg, vol. iii. 533, 535, et seq., on this point from authentic sources.

² Agricola, Historia Provinciae Societatis Jesu Germaniae superioris, i. p. 29.

³ Orlandinus, Historia Societatis Jesu, tom. i. lib. xvi. n. 25 : "Hujus novae bursae regens, quem primum praefecerant, Jacobus Lichius, Lutheranus tandem apparuit."

Such was the state of things in the north and east of Europe—Catholicism was utterly banished from many places, it was subdued and despoiled in all; and while endeavouring to defend itself in these regions, still more formidable enemies were pressing forward to assail it in the west and south.

For the Calvinistic modes of belief were without doubt more decidedly opposed to the Roman tenets than were the doctrines of Luther; and it was precisely at the period we are now contemplating, that Calvinism took possession of the minds of men with irresistible force.

It had arisen on the borders of Italy, Germany, and France, and had extended in all directions. Towards the east, in Germany, Hungary, and Poland, it constituted a subordinate but very important element of the Protestant movement. In western Europe it had already raised itself to independent power.

As the Scandinavian kingdoms had become Lutheran, so had the British people become Calvinists; but in Britain the new church had assumed two distinct forms. In Scotland it had attained power in opposition to the government, and was poor, popular, and democratic, but so much the more irresistible was the fervour which it inspired. In England it had risen to pre-eminence in alliance with the existing government; there it was rich, monarchical, and magnificent, but was content with mere forbearance from opposition to its ritual. The former naturally approximated more closely to the model of the Genevan church, and was infinitely more in accordance with the spirit of Calvin.

The French had embraced the tenets of their countryman, Calvin, with all their characteristic vivacity. In defiance of persecution the French churches were soon regulated according to the Protestant forms of Geneva. They held a synod as early as the year 1559. In 1561 the Venetian ambassador Micheli found no province free from Protestantism; three-fourths of the kingdom were filled with it—Brittany and Normandy, Gascony and Languedoc, Poitou, Touraine, Provence and Dauphiné. "In many of these provinces," he remarks, "meetings are held, sermons are preached, and rules of life are adopted entirely according to the example of Geneva, and without any regard to the royal prohibition. Every one has embraced these opinions, and what is most remarkable, even the clerical body, not only priests, monks, and nuns,—very few of the convents have escaped the infection,—but even the bishops and many of the most distinguished prelates." "Your highness," he observes to the doge, "may be assured that, excepting the common people, who still zealously frequent the churches, all have fallen away. The nobles most especially, the men under forty almost without exception; for although many of them still go to mass, that is only from regard to appearance and through fear; when they are certain of being unobserved they shun both mass and church." When Micheli arrived in Geneva he was informed that immediately after the death of Francis II, fifty preachers from that city had proceeded to different towns in France. He was astonished at the respect in which Calvin was held, and the large amount of money poured in upon him for the benefit of the thousands who had taken refuge in Geneva.¹ He considered it indispensable that religious freedom, at least an "interim," as he expressed it, should be accorded to the French Protestants,

¹ Micheli, Relatione delle cose di Francia l'anno 1561. "Da poi che fu conosciuto che col mettere in prigione e col castigare e con l'abbruciare non solo non si emendavano, ma si disordinavano piu, fu deliberato che non si procedesse piu contra alcuno, eccetto che contra quelli che andavano predicando, seducendo e facendo pubblicamente le congregazioni e le assemblee, e gli altri si lassassero vivere: onde ne furono liberati e cavati di prigione di Parigi e di tutte le altre terre del regno un grandissimo numero, che rimasero poi nel regno praticando liberamente e parlando con ogn'uno e gloriososi che aveano guadagnato la lite contra i Papisti: cosi chiamavano e chiamano li loro adversarii." [When it was seen that by imprisonment, torture, and burning, no amendment was produced, but rather greater disorders, it was resolved to proceed no more against any one, excepting those who went about preaching, misleading and publicly holding assemblies; all others were suffered to live: a great number were liberated from the prisons of Paris and other parts of the kingdom, who then continued in the unrestrained exercise of their religion, talking to all, and boasting that they had gained their cause against the papists,—as they called, and still call, their adversaries.]

if they would avoid the universal effusion of blood. His report was, in fact, soon followed by the edict of 1562. This granted to Protestantism a legal and acknowledged existence, and is the basis of the privileges it has since enjoyed in France.

All these changes on every side—in Germany, France, and England—could not fail to affect the Netherlands also. The German influence had first prevailed in that country, and one of the most powerful motives by which Charles V was induced to the war of Schmalkalden, was that the sympathy excited by the German Protestants in the Netherlands increased the difficulty of governing that province, which formed so important a part of his dominions. By subduing the German princes he prevented, at the same time, an insurrection among his Netherlanders.¹ Yet all his laws, though enforced with excessive rigour, (it was calculated at the time that, up to the year 1562, thirty-six thousand Protestants, men and women, had been put to death,)² were insufficient to impede the progress of the Protestant opinions. The only result was that they gradually took the direction of French Calvinism rather than that of German Lutheranism. Here, too, in defiance of persecution, a formal confession was adopted. In the year 1561, churches were established after the model of Geneva, and by connecting themselves with the local authorities and their adherents, the Protestants obtained a political basis, from which they might hope, not only for safety for the future, but for a certain importance in the state.

Under these circumstances new energies were awakened in the earlier oppositions to the faith of Rome. In the year 1562 the Moravian brethren were formally acknowledged by

¹ A view taken by the Florentine resident, then at the imperial court, and resting, as I think, on good grounds.

² In a report relating to Spain, apparently by Paolo Tiepolo, now in the Venetian Archives, we find, "Una grandissima parte di quei paesi bassi è guasta e corrotta de queste nuove opinioni — — e per tutte le provisioni che si abbiano fatte e per la morte data a molte migliaia di homeni (che da sette anni o pocco piu in qua, per quel che mi è stato affermato da persone principali di que' paesi, sono stati morti di giustitia piu di 36^m. fra homeni e donne) non solamente (non) si è rimendiato, ma," etc.

Maximilian II, and they availed themselves of this fortunate circumstance to elect a large number of new pastors in their synods,—some accounts say one hundred and eighty-eight.¹ In the year 1561, the duke of Savoy saw himself compelled to accord new privileges even to the poor communities of Waldenses in the mountains.² To the most remote and neglected corner of Europe Protestant doctrines had extended their life-inspiring power. How immeasurable an empire had they conquered within the space of forty years! From Iceland to the Pyrenees,—from Finland to the summits of the Italian Alps. Even on the southern side of the Alps, opinions analogous to Protestantism had, as we have seen, once prevailed,—they embraced the whole territory of the Latin church. A large majority of the upper classes, and of the men most active in public life, were attached to them: whole nations were devoted with enthusiasm to these tenets, which had entirely changed the constitution of states.³ This is all the more extraordinary

¹ Regenvolscii Ecclesiae Slavonicae, i. p. 63.

² Leger, Histoire des Eglises Vaudoises, ii. p. 38, gives the treaty.

³ The loss was thus regarded in Rome itself. Tiepolo, Relatione di Pio IV e V: "Parlando solamente di quelli (popoli) d'Europa che non solo obediavano lui (al papa) ma ancora seguivano in tutto i riti e le consuetudini della chiesa romana celebrando ancora li officii nella lingua latina, si sa che l'Inghilterra, la Scotia, la Dania, la Norvegia, la Suetia e finalmente tutti i paesi settentrionali si sono alienati da lei: la Germania è quasi tutta perduta, la Bohemia e la Polonia si trovano in gran parte infette, li paesi bassi della Fiandra sono così corrotti che per rimedio che vi si sforzi dar loro il duca d'Alva difficilmente ritorneranno alla prima sanità, e finalmente la Francia per rispetto di questi mal humori è tutta ripiena di confusioni: in modo che non pare che sia restato altro di sano e di sicuro al pontefice che la Spagna e l'Italia con alcune poche isole e con quel paese che è dalla Sea V^{ra} in Dalmatia et in Grecia posseduto." [Speaking only of those nations of Europe which not only used to obey the pope, but followed in every thing the rites and customs of the Roman church, celebrating public worship in the Latin tongue, it is known that England, Scotland, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, and all the countries of the north are alienated; Germany is almost wholly lost, Bohemia and Poland are deeply infected; the Low Countries of Flanders are so much corrupted that all the duke of Alva's efforts will scarcely restore them to their original health. Finally, France, by means of these evil humours, is filled with confusion; so that there seem to remain in health, and firm to the pope, only Spain and Italy, with some few islands, and those countries possessed by your serenity in Dalmatia and Greece.] (See Appendix No. 41.)

because the Protestant creed was by no means a mere negation of the papacy—a simple renunciation. It was in the highest degree positive, a renovation of Christian sentiments and principles, that govern human life even to the most profound recesses of the soul.

2. RESOURCES POSSESSED BY THE PAPACY FOR ACTIVE CONFLICT

The Papacy and Catholicism had long maintained themselves against these advances of their enemy, in an attitude of defence it is true, but passive only ; upon the whole they were compelled to endure them.

Affairs now assumed a different aspect.

We have considered the internal development by which Catholicism began the work of her own restoration. It may be affirmed generally that a vital and active force was again manifested, that the Church had regenerated her creed in the spirit of the age, and had established reforms in accordance with the demands of the times. The religious tendencies which had appeared in southern Europe, were not suffered to become hostile to herself, she adopted them, and gained the mastery of their movements ; thus she renewed her powers, and infused fresh vigour into her system. The Protestant spirit alone had hitherto filled the theatre of the world with results that held the minds of men enthralled ; another spirit, equally deserving of esteem perhaps, if regarded from an elevated point of view, though of decidedly opposite character, now entered the lists, displaying similar power to make the minds of men its own, and to kindle them into activity.

The influence of the restored Catholic system was first established in the two southern peninsulas, but this was not accomplished without extreme severities. The Spanish Inquisition received the aid of that lately revived in Rome ; every movement of Protestantism was violently suppressed. But at the same time those tendencies of the inward life which renovated Catholicism claimed and enchained as her own were peculiarly powerful in those countries. The sovereigns also attached themselves to the interests of the Church.

It was of the highest importance that Philip II, the most powerful of all, adhered so decidedly to the papacy; with the pride of a Spaniard, by whom unimpeachable Catholicism was regarded as the sign of a purer blood and more noble descent, he rejected every adverse opinion: the character of his policy was, however, not wholly governed by mere personal feeling. From remote times, and more especially since the regulations established by Isabella, the kingly dignity in Spain had assumed an ecclesiastical character; in every province the royal authority was strengthened by the addition of spiritual power; deprived of the Inquisition, it would not have sufficed to govern the kingdom. Even in his American possessions, the king appeared above all in the light of a disseminator of the Christian and Catholic faith. This was the bond by which all his territories were united in obedience to his rule; he could not have abandoned it, without incurring real danger. The extension of Huguenot opinions in the south of France caused the utmost alarm in Spain; the Inquisition believed itself bound to redoubled vigilance. "I assure your highness," observes the Venetian ambassador to his sovereign, on the 25th August, 1562, "that no great religious movement is to be desired for this country; there are many of the people who long for a change of religion."¹ The papal nuncio considered the result of the council then assembled of the same importance to the royal as to the papal authority. "For the obedience paid to the king," he remarks, "and his whole government, depend on the Inquisition; should this lose its authority, insurrections would immediately follow."

¹ Dispaccio Soranzo, Perpignan, 28 Maggio: "Essendo in questa provincia (Spagna) molti Ugonotti quasi non osano mostrarsi per la severissima dimostrazione che qui fanno contra. Dubitano che non si mettano insieme essendone molti per tutta la Spagna." [There are many Huguenots in this province (Spain) who scarcely dare show themselves, because of the severe measures taken against them; but it is suspected that they think of combining, there being many of them throughout Spain.]

The power possessed by Philip in the Netherlands secured to the southern system an immediate influence over the whole of Europe ; but besides this, all was far from being lost in other countries. The emperor, the kings of France and Poland, and the duke of Bavaria, still adhered to the Catholic church. On all sides there were spiritual princes whose expiring zeal might be reanimated ; there were also many places where Protestant opinions had not yet made their way among the mass of the people. The majority of the peasantry throughout France, Poland, and even Hungary,¹ still remained Catholic. Paris, which even in those days exercised a powerful influence over the other French towns, had not yet been affected by the new doctrines. In England a great part of the nobility and commons were still Catholic ; and in Ireland the whole of the ancient native population remained in the old faith. Protestantism had gained no admission into the Tyrolese or Swiss Alps, nor had it made any great progress among the peasantry of Bavaria. Canisius compared the Tyrolese and Bavarians with the two tribes of Israel, "who alone remained faithful to the Lord." The internal causes on which this pertinacity, this immovable attachment to tradition, among nations so dissimilar, was founded, might well repay a more minute examination. A similar constancy was exhibited in the Walloon provinces of the Netherlands.

And now the papacy resumed a position in which it could once more gain the mastery of all these inclinations, and bind them indissolubly to itself. Although it had experienced great changes, it still possessed the inestimable advantage of having all the externals of the past and the habit of obedience on its side. In the council so prosperously concluded, the popes had even gained an accession of that authority which it had been the purpose of the temporal powers to restrict ; and had strengthened their influence over the national churches ; they had, moreover, abandoned that temporal policy by which they had formerly involved

¹ If it were not, in this case, mere ignorance, as Lazarus Schwendi asserts: "En Hongrie tout est confusion et misère : ils sont de la plus part Huguenots, mais avec une extrême ignorance du peuple." Schwendi au Prince d'Orange, Archives de la Maison d'Orange-Nassau, i. p. 288.

Italy and all Europe in confusion. They attached themselves to Spain with perfect confidence and without any reservations, fully returning the devotion evinced by that kingdom to the Roman church. The Italian principality, the enlarged dominions of the pontiff, contributed eminently to the success of his ecclesiastical enterprises; while the interests of the universal Catholic church were for some time essentially promoted by the overplus of its revenues.

Thus strengthened internally, thus supported by powerful adherents, and by the idea of which they were the representatives, the popes exchanged the defensive position, with which they had hitherto been forced to content themselves, for that of assailants. The attack that resulted, its progress and consequences, it is the principal object of this work to consider.

A boundless scene opens before us, the action is proceeding in many places at the same time, and we are called on to direct our attention to the most varying and widely-separated quarters of the world.

Religious activity is intimately connected with political impulses; combinations are formed which embrace the whole world, and under whose influence the struggle for mastery succeeds or fails: we shall fix our attention the more earnestly on the great events of general politics, because they often coincide exactly with the results of the religious conflict.

But we must not confine ourselves to generalities; if the conquests of the sword require some native sympathies with the victor on the part of the conquered for their achievement, still more indispensable are these sympathies to the conquest of opinion. We must examine the interests of the several countries to their utmost depths, in order to gain a full comprehension of those internal movements by which the designs of Rome were facilitated.

So great an abundance and variety of events and modes of life is here presented to us, that we have to fear the impossibility of comprehending the whole under one view. The state of things before us has its basis fixed on kindred principles, and occasionally exhibits great crises, but it also presents an infinite multiplicity of phenomena.

Let us begin with Germany, where the papacy suffered its first great losses, and where the most important events of the conflict between the two principles again took place. Eminent service was here rendered to the church of Rome by the society of the Jesuits, which united worldly prudence with religious zeal, and was deeply imbued with the spirit of modern Catholicism. Let us first endeavour to gain a clear perception of the effective power possessed by this order.

3. THE FIRST JESUIT SCHOOLS IN GERMANY

At the diet of Augsburg, in the year 1550, Ferdinand I was accompanied by his confessor, Bishop Urban of Laibach. This prelate was one of the few who had never allowed themselves to be shaken in their faith. In his own diocese he frequently ascended the pulpit, and exhorted the people in the local dialect to remain steadfast to the creed of their fathers, preaching to them of the one fold under the one shepherd.¹ The Jesuit Le Jay, was at Augsburg on the same occasion, and excited attention by certain conversions. Bishop Urban made his acquaintance, and heard from him for the first time of the colleges established by the Jesuits in different universities. Seeing the decay into which Catholic theology had fallen in Germany, the bishop advised his sovereign to found a similar college in Vienna, and the emperor received this suggestion very cordially. In a letter that he sent to Loyola on the subject,² he declares his conviction, that the only means by which the declining tenets of Catholicism could be restored in Germany, was to supply the youth of the country with learned and pious Catholic teachers. The preliminaries were easily arranged; in the year 1551, thirteen Jesuits, among whom was Le Jay himself, arrived in Vienna, where Ferdinand immediately granted them a residence, chapel, and pension; he soon after incorporated them with the university, and even entrusted to them the superintendence of that establishment.

¹ Valvassor, Ehre des Herzogthums Krain, Theil ii. buch vii. p. 433.

² Printed in Socher, Historia Provinciae Austriae Societatis Jesu, i. 21.

Soon after this they rose into consideration at Cologne, where they had already lived for a year or two, but with so little success, that they had been obliged to dwell apart. In the year 1556, the endowed school, previously mentioned as governed by a Protestant regent, afforded them the opportunity of acquiring a better position; for since there was a party in the city whose most earnest desire it was that the university should remain Catholic, the patrons of the Jesuits finally saw their counsels prevail, and the establishment was committed to the care of that order. Their principal supporters were the prior of the Carthusians, the provincial of the Carmelites, and especially Dr. Johann Gropper, who sometimes gave an entertainment, to which he invited the most influential citizens, that he might find opportunity for promoting the cause he had most at heart, after the good old German fashion, over a glass of wine. Fortunately for the Jesuits, one of their order was a native of Cologne, Johann Rhetius, a man of patrician family, to whom the endowed school might more especially be entrusted. But this was not done without strict limitations; the Jesuits were expressly forbidden to establish in the school those monastic habits of life which were usual in their colleges.¹

They gained firm footing in Ingolstadt also about the same time; their previous efforts had been rendered useless, principally by the opposition of the younger members of the university, who would not permit any privileged school to interfere with the private instruction they were in the habit of giving; but in the year 1556, when the duke, as we have said, had been forced into large concessions in favour of the Protestants, his Catholic counsellors declared it to be imperatively necessary that effectual measures should be taken for upholding the ancient faith. The most active among these were the chancellor Wiguleus Hund, who proceeded as zealously in the maintenance of the ancient Church, as he had previously done in the investigation of her primitive history, and the duke's private secretary, Heinrich Schwigger. By their efforts, the Jesuits were recalled, and eighteen of them entered Ingolstadt on St. Willibald's day, July 7, 1556, having selected that day because St. Willibald was regarded as the first bishop of the diocese. They found many obstacles opposed to them, both in the city and university, but they gradually overcame them all by favour of the same persons to whom they owed their recall.

¹ Sacchinus, Hist. Societatis Jesu, pars ii. lib. i. n. 103.

From these three metropolitan centres the Jesuits now extended themselves in all directions.

From Vienna they proceeded to erect colleges of their order throughout the dominions of Austria. In 1556, the emperor established them in Prague, where he founded a school, principally for the education of the young nobility. To this he sent his own pages, and the order received countenance and support from the Catholic part of the Bohemian nobles, more especially from the houses of Rosenberg and Lobkowitz. One of the most distinguished men in Hungary at that time was Nicolaus Olahus, archbishop of Gran, of Wallachian extraction, as his name implies. His father Stoia, in an excess of terror at the murder of a Waiwode of his family, had dedicated him to the Church, and his progress in this career had been most auspicious. He had already occupied the important office of private secretary under the last native kings, and had subsequently risen still higher in the service of the Austrian party. Contemplating the general decay of Catholicism in Hungary, he was convinced that the last hope for its restoration was in confirming the hold it retained on the common people, who had not entirely abandoned the ancient creed. Teachers of Catholic principles were required to effect this, and with the purpose of forming such teachers, he established a college of Jesuits at Tyrnau in the year 1561, assigning them a pension from his own revenues, to which the Emperor Ferdinand added the grant of an abbey. At the period when the Jesuits arrived, an assembly of the clergy of the diocese had just been convened; their first efforts were devoted to the attempt of reclaiming these Hungarian priests and pastors from the heterodox tenets to which they were inclining. About this time they were summoned into Moravia also. Wilhelm Prussinowski, bishop of Olmütz, who had become acquainted with the order during his studies in Italy, invited them to his bishopric. Hurtado Perez, a Spaniard, was the first rector in Olmütz; they learnt the language, adapted themselves to the manners and customs of the country and reaped success; we soon after find them in like manner settled in Brünn.¹

From Cologne the society spread over the whole of the Rhenish provinces. In Trier, as we have before related, Protestantism had found adherents, and caused some ferment. Johann von Stein, the archbishop, determined to inflict slight punishments only on the refractory, and to repress innovations chiefly by argument. He invited the two principals of the Jesuit school at Cologne to Coblenz, when he informed them that he desired to have the aid of members of their order "to maintain," as he expresses it, "the flock committed to him in their duty, rather by admonition and friendly instruction than by weapons or menaces." He applied to Rome, also, and very soon came to an arrangement with that court; no long time elapsed before six Jesuits arrived in his diocese from Rome; others were sent from Cologne. On the 3rd of February, 1561, they opened their college with great solemnity, and undertook to preach during the fasts of the Lent then approaching.²

About the same time, Peter Echter and Simon Bagen, two privy counsellors of the elector Daniel of Mainz, were also persuaded that the admission of the Jesuits presented the only means of restoring the decayed university of their city. The canons and feudatories did their best to oppose this idea, but in despite of their efforts, a college for the society was established at Mainz, and a preparatory school at Aschaffenburg.

The order continued to advance up the Rhine: they were most especially desirous of obtaining a seat at Spires, not only because many eminent men were included among the assessors of the supreme court (Kammergericht), over whom it would be of the utmost advantage to obtain influence, but also because they would be there in the immediate neighbourhood of Heidelberg university (which at that time enjoyed a high reputation for its Protestant professors), and could the more effectually oppose its influence. Gradually the establishment they wished for at Spires was effected.¹

¹ A later bishop, Stanislaus Pawlowski, complains in a letter to the general of the Jesuits (June 7, 1587) that Perez had received another appointment. He describes Moravia as a "provincia haereticorum molitionibus maxime exposita." The quality which he demanded above all from those who wished to produce any result here was "comitas et discreta in agendo prudentia."

² Browerus: Annales Trevirenses, tom. ii. lib. xxi. 106-125.

Permitting no loss of time, they also tried their fortune along the Maine. Although Frankfurt was entirely Protestant, they had yet hope of accomplishing something during the fair. The attempt was not to be made without danger, and, to avoid discovery, they were compelled to change their lodgings every night. At Würzburg they were much more secure, and even received a cordial welcome.² The admonition addressed by the Emperor Ferdinand to the bishops at the diet of 1559, exhorting them at length to exert their utmost power for the maintenance of the Catholic church, appeared to produce its effect, and contributed largely to this brilliant progress of the society in the ecclesiastical principalities. From Würzburg they spread throughout Franconia.

The Tyrol had, meanwhile, been opened to them from another quarter. By the desire of the daughters of Ferdinand, they settled themselves at Innsbruck, and soon after at Hall, in the same district. In Bavaria they continued to make progress. At Munich, where they arrived in 1559, they were even better satisfied than at Ingolstadt, and declared that city to be the Rome of Germany. Already the order had planted a new and large colony at no great distance from Ingolstadt. Anxious to restore his university of Dillingen to its original destination, Cardinal Truchsess also resolved to dismiss all the professors who still taught there, and intrust that establishment to the care of the Jesuits. A formal agreement was accordingly made at Botzen, between German and Italian commissioners on the part of the cardinal and the order respectively. In 1563 the Jesuits arrived in Dillingen, and took possession of the professors' chairs. They relate, with much complacency, that the cardinal, on returning from a journey shortly after their arrival, and making a solemn entry into Dillingen, distinguished them above all those who had gone forth to receive him, offered them his hand to kiss, greeted them as his brethren, visited their cells in person, and dined with them: he promoted their wishes to the utmost of his power, and soon established a mission in Augsburg for members of the order.¹

¹ Neuser, for example, in his celebrated letters to the sultan, describes himself as a teacher and preacher at Heidelberg—"to which place the most learned men of the whole German nation now resort." Arnold, Ketzerhist. ii. 1133.

² Gropp, Würzburgische Chronik der letzteren Zeiten, th. i. p. 237.

This was a most remarkable progress to have been made by the society in so short a time. In the year 1551 they had no settled position in Germany: in 1566, their institutions held possession of Bavaria and the Tyrol, Franconia and Swabia, a large part of the Rhenish provinces and Austria. They had penetrated, also, into Hungary, Bohemia, and Moravia. The effect of their exertions soon became perceptible. So early as the year 1561 the papal nuncio declares that "they are winning many souls, and doing great service to the holy see." This was the first effectual counteraction of Protestant labours, the first enduring impression made against them in Germany.

The efforts of the Jesuits were, above all, directed towards the universities. Their ambition was to rival the fame of those of the Protestants. The education of that day was a learned one merely, and was based exclusively on the study of the ancient languages. This the Jesuits prosecuted with earnest zeal, and in certain of their schools they very soon had professors who might claim a place with the restorers of classical learning. Nor did they neglect the cultivation of the exact sciences. At Cologne Frans Koster lectured on astronomy in a manner at once agreeable and instructive. But their principal object was still theological discipline, as will be readily comprehended. The Jesuits lectured with the utmost diligence, even during the holidays, reviving the practice of disputations, without which they declared all instruction to be dead. These disputations, which they held in public, were conducted with dignity and decorum, were rich in matter, and altogether the most brilliant that had ever been witnessed. At Ingolstadt they soon persuaded themselves that their progress in theology was such as would enable the university to compete successfully with any other in Germany. Ingolstadt now acquired an influence among Catholics similar to that possessed among Protestants by Wittenberg and Geneva.

¹ Sacchinus, pars ii. lib. viii. n. 108.

With equal industry and care did the society proceed in the conduct of the Latin schools. It was an essential maxim with Lainez, that good teachers should be supplied to the lower grammatical classes. He was convinced that first impressions are of the utmost importance to the whole future life of the man, and sought with a discriminating judgment for men who, having once accepted this subordinate office in teaching, would consent to devote themselves to it for their whole lives; since it is only with time that so difficult an occupation can be learned, or the authority proper to a teacher fully acquired. Here also the Jesuits succeeded to admiration. It was found that young people gained more with them in six months, than with other teachers in two years; even Protestants removed their children from distant schools, to place them under the care of the Jesuits.

They next established schools for the poor, arranged modes of instruction adapted to children, and enforced the practice of catechising. Canisius prepared his catechism, which satisfied the wants of the learners by its well-connected questions and apposite replies.

This instruction was imparted entirely in the spirit of that fanciful devotion which had characterized the Jesuits from their earliest establishment. The first rector in Vienna was a Spaniard, named Juan Victoria; a man who had signalized his entrance into the society by walking along the Corso of Rome during the festivities of the carnival, clothed in sackcloth, and scourging himself as he walked, till the blood streamed from him on all sides. The children educated in the Jesuit schools of Vienna were soon distinguished by their steadfast refusal of such food as was forbidden on fast-days, while their parents ate without scruple. In Cologne it was again become an honour to wear the rosary. Relics were once more held up to public reverence in Trier, where for many years no one had ventured to exhibit them. In the year 1560, the youth of Ingolstadt belonging to the Jesuit school walked two and two on a pilgrimage to Eichstadt, in order to be strengthened for their confirmation, "by the dew that dropped from the tomb of Saint Walpurgis." The modes of thought and feeling thus implanted in the schools were propagated by means of preaching and confession through the whole population.

We have here a case for which the history of the world could probably not produce a parallel.

When any new intellectual movement has exercised its influence on mankind, this has always been effected by great and imposing personal qualities, or by the overpowering force of new ideas; but in this case the effect was accomplished without any extraordinary display of mental effort. The Jesuits may have been learned and pious in their way, but none will assert that their science was the product of a free exercise of mind, or that their piety arose from the depth and ingenuousness of a single heart. They had learning enough to acquire reputation, to awaken confidence, to train and attach scholars; to more than this they did not aspire. Their piety not only sufficed to secure them from all reproach on the point of morals; it was positively conspicuous, and thus was liable to no question: this was enough for them. Neither their piety nor their learning disposed them to seek untrodden or undefined paths; but in one respect they were indeed remarkably distinguished—the severity of their method. With them all was nicely calculated, every movement and action had its definite end and aim; such a combination of competent learning and unwearying zeal, of studies and persuasion, of pomp and asceticism, of widely-extended influence and unity in the governing principle and intention, has never been exhibited in the world before or since. At once diligent and visionary, worldly wise, yet full of enthusiasm; well-bred men and attractive companions; disregarding their personal interests, but labouring for the advancement of each other. We cannot wonder that they were successful.

Another consideration connects itself with this subject in the mind of a German observer. In Germany the papal theology had fallen, as we have said, into almost entire decay. The Jesuits arose to revive it. Who were the Jesuits that first appeared there? They were Spaniards, Italians, and Flemings. The name of their order remained long unknown; they were called the Spanish priests. They took possession of the professors' chairs, and found scholars who attached themselves to their doctrines. From the Germans the Society received nothing; its tenets and constitution were completely formed before arriving in Germany. The progress of the order in that country may be generally regarded as a new exertion of influence by the Latin portion of Europe over the Germanic. The Germans were conquered on their own soil, in their very home; a portion of their country was torn from their hands; and this effect was without doubt produced because the German theologians had never arrived at any clear understanding among themselves, and were not sufficiently magnanimous to endure minor differences in each other. Extreme points of doctrine were insisted on, antagonists assailed each other with reckless violence, so that those who were not wholly fixed in opinion were perplexed and rendered more than ever wavering. A path was thus opened to these foreigners, who gained the mastery of men's minds by a system of belief most carefully constructed, finished in its most minute details, and leaving no shadow of cause for doubt.

4. BEGINNING OF THE COUNTER-REFORMATION IN GERMANY

Possessing all the advantages we have described, it is yet obvious that the Jesuits could not have succeeded to so great an extent, had they not been aided by the secular arm and favoured by the princes of the Empire. For as with political questions, so had it happened with those of a theological nature. No measure had yet been brought into effect by which the constitution of the Empire, in its character essentially hierarchical, could be placed in harmony with the new circumstances of religion. The only result of the peace of Augsburg, as it was at first understood and subsequently expounded, was a new extension of the temporal sovereignty. The different provinces also required a high degree of independence in affairs of religion. The creed adopted by the prince, and the understanding between him and his estates, thenceforth decided the ecclesiastical position to be assumed by the country.

This would seem to be an arrangement expressly devised for the benefit of Protestantism. It nevertheless tended almost exclusively to the promotion of Catholicism. The former was already established before it had come into effect; the latter commenced its restoration only on receiving this support.

This occurred first in Bavaria; and the manner in which it took place there well deserves especial attention, from the immense influence it exercised.

The Bavarian diet presents us during some time with a series of disputes between the sovereign and his estates. The duke was in perpetual need of money, loaded with debt, obliged to impose new taxes, and frequently compelled to seek assistance from his estates. In return for these subsidies, the estates required concessions, principally of a religious kind. A state of affairs, similar to that which had long prevailed in Austria, seemed impending in Bavaria: a legitimate opposition of the estates to the sovereign, based at once on religion and on privileges, unless the latter should himself become a convert to Protestantism.

It was, without question, this position of things by which, as we have related, the introduction of the Jesuits was chiefly caused. It may, possibly, be true that their doctrines produced an impression on the mind of Duke Albert V, who declared, at a later period, that all he had ever known of God's laws had been imparted to him by Hoffäus and Canisius, both Jesuits. There was, nevertheless, another cause in operation. Pius IV not only called the attention of Albert to the fact that every religious concession would diminish the obedience of his subjects,¹—which was not to be denied, as German principalities were then situated ;—but he enforced the effects of his admonition by marks of favour, abandoning to the duke one-tenth of the property of his clergy. This not only rendered Albert V less dependent on his estates, but also shewed him what advantages he might expect from a connection with the church of Rome.

Then came the question, whether the duke would have power to set aside the religious opposition already organized in his estates.

On this task he entered at a diet assembled at Ingolstadt, in the year 1563. The prelates were already well disposed to his views, and he next tried his influence on the towns. Whether it was that the doctrines of reviving Catholicism and the activity of the Jesuits, who insinuated themselves everywhere, had gained influence in the cities,—especially with the leading members of their assemblies,—or that other considerations prevailed, suffice it to say, that on this occasion the cities did not renew those demands for religious concessions, which they had hitherto always urged with great eagerness ; but proceeded to grant supplies without making conditions for new privileges. The only opposition now remaining came from the nobles ; that body left the diet in discontent, nay, much exasperated ; menaces, uttered by various noblemen, were repeated to the duke.² The most distinguished among them, the Count of Ortenburg, whose claim to hold his county immediately of the Empire the duke contested, at length resolved to introduce the evangelical confession into that territory without further delay ; but in doing so, he placed weapons dangerous to himself and his order in the hands of the duke, the rather, as in one of the castles seized by Albert, a correspondence between the Bavarian nobles was discovered, containing severe and offensive remarks on the sovereign ; describing him as a hardened Pharaoh, and his council as sanguinary enemies of the poor Christians.

¹ Legationes Paparum ad Duces Bavaricæ, MS. in the library at Munich, Prima Legatio, 1563 : “Quodsi Sua Celsitudo Ill^{ma} absque sedis apostolicæ autoritate usum calicis concedat, ipsi principi etiam plurimum decederet de ejus apud subditos autoritate.” At the diet it was ascertained, that the prince had suffered himself to be dazzled by the tenth (decimatio) granted him.

² Private notices respecting the violent and unbecoming expressions used in Freiberg, Geschichte der bayerischen Landstände, ii. 352.

Other expressions found in these letters were believed to intimate the existence of a conspiracy, and furnished Albert with a pretext for calling his refractory nobles to account.¹ He inflicted a punishment on them that cannot be called rigorous, but it sufficed to his purpose. Every nobleman compromised was excluded from the Bavarian diet ; and as these members had formed the only opposition remaining, the duke was, by their absence, rendered absolute master of his estates, among whom there has never since been any question agitated concerning religion.

The importance of this measure was instantly manifest. Duke Albert had long urged the pope and council with great importunity for a grant of the cup to the laity ; he seemed to consider the whole happiness of his territories to depend on this concession. In April of the year 1564, he finally received this grant. The result seems scarcely credible. He did not even suffer the fact of its being sent him to be made known ! The position of his affairs had changed. A privilege departing from the strict tenour of Catholicism now appeared to the duke injurious rather than advantageous. Certain communes of Lower Bavaria, which repeated their former demands for the cup with clamorous violence, he even compelled to silence by main force.²

In a short time there was no prince in Germany more decidedly Catholic than Duke Albert, and he then proceeded with the most earnest zeal to make his whole territory Catholic also.

The professors of Ingolstadt were compelled to subscribe the confession of faith published in pursuance of the decree issued by the council of Trent. The officers of the ducal government were obliged to pledge themselves by oath to a confession of unquestionable Catholicism ; whoever refused this was dismissed from his employment. Duke Albert would not endure the Protestant creed even among the common people. In the first instance, he sent certain Jesuits into Lower Bavaria to convert the inhabitants; and not only the preachers, but also all other persons who persisted in retaining the evangelical faith, were constrained to sell their property, and quit the country.¹ The same means were afterwards adopted in all other parts of the dukedom. No magistrate would have ventured to tolerate Protestants; he who should have done so would have incurred severe punishment.

¹ Huschberg, Geschichte des Hauses Ortenburg, s. 390.

² Adlzreitter, Annales Boicæ Gentis, ii. xi. n. 22 : "Albertus eam indulgentiam juris publici in Boica esse noluit."

But with this restoration of Catholicism, all its modern forms were brought from Italy into Germany. An index of prohibited books was prepared; they were sought through the libraries, and burnt in large numbers; those of rigidly Catholic character were, on the contrary, highly favoured. The duke left nothing undone to encourage the authors of such books. He caused the History of the Saints, by Surius, to be translated into German, and printed at his own cost. The utmost veneration was shewn towards relics; and St. Benno, of whom in another part of Germany (Meissen) no one would any longer hear mention, was solemnly declared the patron saint of Bavaria. Architecture and music, in the taste of the restored Church, were introduced at Munich. Above all, the Jesuit institutions were promoted; for by their agency it was that the youth of Bavaria were to be educated in a spirit of strict orthodoxy.

The Jesuits, on their part, could not sufficiently praise the duke; according to them he was a second Josias, a new Theodosius.

One question only remained to be considered.

As the extension of temporal authority, derived by the Protestant princes from their influence over religious affairs, increased, so much the more oppressive would it have seemed if the Catholic sovereigns had suffered restriction from the restored authority of the ecclesiastical power.

But for this, also, a remedy was provided. The popes clearly perceived that they could not succeed in upholding their decaying influence, or in regaining it when lost, without aid from the temporal sovereigns : they cherished no illusion on this subject, and made it their whole policy to preserve a strict alliance with the princes of Europe.

¹ Agricola, Ps. i. Dec. iii. 116-120.

To the first nuncio whom Gregory XIII sent into Bavaria, he gave instructions wherein this conviction is expressed without any circumlocution. "The most ardent wish of his holiness," it declares, "is to restore the decayed discipline of the Church ; but he sees that to attain so important an end, he must unite himself with temporal sovereigns : by their piety, religion has been upheld ; by their assistance alone, could Church discipline and good order be restored."¹

The pope accordingly made over to the duke his authority for stimulating the exertions of the negligent bishops, for carrying into effect the decrees of a synod that had been held at Salzburg, and for constraining the bishop of Ratisbon and his chapter to erect a seminary : in a word, he confided to him a sort of spiritual supervision, and took counsel with him as to whether it might not be advisable to found seminaries for the conventual clergy, such as were already established for the secular members of the hierarchy. To all this the duke assented very willingly ; he stipulated only that the bishops should respect the rights of the sovereign, whether those descending from earlier periods or the privileges but newly acquired, and that the clergy should be kept in discipline and subordination by their superiors. Edicts are extant in which the prince treats the convents as property of the treasury (Kammergut), and subjects them to secular administration.

In the course of the reformation, certain clerical attributes had been appropriated by the Protestant princes : the same thing was now done by the Catholic sovereigns. What occurred in the first case in opposition to the papacy was here accomplished in concert with it. If Protestant rulers established their younger sons as administrators extraordinary in the neighbouring evangelical bishoprics, so in those that had remained Catholic the sons of Catholic princes received immediate investiture of the episcopal dignity. Gregory had promised Duke Albert, from the very first, to neglect nothing that might be of advantage either to himself or his sons. Two of these sons were very soon installed in the most important benefices, and one of them gradually rose to the highest dignities of the empire.¹

¹ Legatio Gregorii XIII, 1573: "Sua Sanctitas in eam curam incumbit, qua ecclesiastica disciplina jam ferme in Germania collapsa aliquo modo instauretur, quod cum antecessores sui aut neglexerint aut leviter attigerint, non tam bene quam par erat de republica christiana meritos esse animadvertit:—adiungendos sibi ad tale tantumque opus catholicos principes sapientissime statuit." The ambassador, Bartolomeo, count of Porzia, distinctly promises: "Suam sanctitatem nihil unquam praetermissuram esse, quod est e re sua (ducis Bavariae) aut filiorum."

In addition to all this, Bavaria gained great and real importance in consequence of the position she assumed. Becoming the champion of a great principle, which was in the act of acquiring new power, she was long regarded by the less powerful German princes of the Catholic faith as their leader.

For the duke now laboured zealously for the restoration of the ancient Church in every portion of territory that owned his rule. The Count of Haag had tolerated Protestantism in his domains, but no sooner had this county fallen into the duke's hands than he expelled the Protestants and reinstated the creed and ritual of Catholicism. In the battle of Moncontour, the Margrave Philibert of Baden-Baden had remained dead on the field; his son Philip, then ten years old, was brought up in Munich under the guardianship of Duke Albert, and, as a matter of course, in the Catholic faith. But the duke would not wait for what the young margrave might decide on when arrived at an age to govern; he instantly despatched his high-steward Count Schwarzenberg, and the Jesuit, George Schorich, who had already acted together in the conversion of Lower Bavaria, into the territories of Baden, with commission to restore that country to Catholicism by similar means. It is true that the Protestant inhabitants opposed imperial decrees to these attempts, but those edicts were not regarded; the plenipotentiaries proceeded, as the historian of the Jesuits complacently declares, "to set the minds and ears of the simple multitude free for the reception of the heavenly doctrine;" that is to say, they removed the Protestant preachers, compelled the monks who had not remained strictly orthodox to abjure all dissenting tenets, placed Catholic teachers in all the schools, primary and superior, and banished the laity who would not obey the orders imposed on them. In two years, 1570, 1571, the whole territory was again rendered Catholic.¹

¹ Even Pius V allowed his rigorous principles to bend in favour of the Bavarian duke. Tiepolo, Relatione di Pio IV e V: "D'altri principi secolari de Germania non si sa chi altro veramente sia cattolico che il duca di Baviera: però in gratificatione sua il pontefice ha concesso che il figliuolo, che di gran lunga non ha ancora l'età determinata dal concilio, habbia il vescovato Frisingense: cosa che non è da lui stata concessa ad altri."

While these things were taking place in the secular principalities, similar events occurred by a necessity still more inevitable in the ecclesiastical sovereignties.

The spiritual princes of Germany were at one time more especially distinguished by their ecclesiastical than by their secular character, and the popes lost not a moment in extending over the episcopal office in Germany that increase of power accorded to them by the council of Trent.

First Canisius was sent to the different ecclesiastical courts with copies of these edicts: he conveyed them to Mainz, Trier, Cologne, Osnabrück, and Würzburg,² and with infinite address he contrived to give meaning and effect to the official respect and courtesy with which he was received. The matter was afterwards discussed in the diet held at Augsburg in 1566.

Pope Pius V had feared that Protestantism would then make new demands and obtain new concessions. He had already instructed his nuncio, in case of urgency, to put forward a protest, threatening the emperor and princes with deprivation of all their rights; he even thought that the moment for this step had arrived.³ But the nuncio, who had a nearer view of things, did not consider this advisable; he saw that there was nothing more to fear. The Protestants were divided, the Catholics held together. The latter frequently assembled at the house of the nuncio to hold council on the measures to be taken in common. The blameless life of Canisius, his unquestionable orthodoxy, and his prudence, procured him great influence in these meetings, wherein it was decided that no concession should be accorded. This diet was, on the contrary, the first in which the Catholic princes opposed an effectual resistance to the Protestant demands. The pope's exhortations found attentive listeners; in a special assembly of the ecclesiastical princes, the decrees of the council of Trent were provisionally accepted.

¹ Sacchinus, pars iii. lib. vi. n. 88; lib. vii. n. 67; Agricola, i. iv. 17, 18. The pope duly valued the duke on that account. In the account of the embassy, we are told "Mira perfunditur laetitia cum audit ill. Ser^{tie} V^{rae} opera et industria marchionem Badensem in religione catholica educari, ad quod accedit cura ingens, quam adhibuit in comitatu de Hag, ut catholica fides, a qua turpiter defecerant, restituatur."

² Maderus de Vita P. Canisii, lib. ii. c. ii. Sacchinus, iii. ii. 22.

³ Catena, Vita di Pio V, p. 40, gives an extract from the instruction. Gratiani, Vita Commendonii, lib. iii. c. ii.

A new life may be said to have commenced from this moment in the Catholic church of Germany. These decrees were gradually published in the provincial synods; seminaries were erected in the episcopal sees; the first who complied with the rule to that effect, being, so far as I can ascertain, the bishop of Eichstädt, who founded the Willibald College (Collegium Willibaldinum).¹ The "professio fidei" was subscribed by persons of all classes. It is a very important fact that the universities were also compelled to subscribe it; a regulation proposed by Lainez, approved by the pope, and now carried into effect in Germany, principally by the zeal of Canisius: not only were no appointments made, but no degree was conferred, even in the faculty of medicine, until the "professio fidei" had first been subscribed. The first university into which this rule was introduced, was, so far as I can discover, that of Dillingen; the others gradually followed. The most rigid visitation of the churches commenced, and the bishops, who had hitherto been extremely negligent, now displayed the utmost zeal and devotion.

Among the most zealous of these prelates, Jacob von Eltz, elector of Trier, from 1567 to 1581, more especially distinguished himself. He had been educated in the ancient discipline of Louvain, and had long devoted his literary labours to Catholicism; he had compiled a martyrology, and composed a book of prayers. In the time of his predecessor he had taken a very active part in the introduction of the Jesuits into Trier, and on his own accession to the government, he had committed the visitation of his diocese to their society. Even schoolmasters were compelled to subscribe the "professio fidei;" strict discipline and subordination were enforced upon the clergy by the severe and methodical system of the Jesuits; parish priests were required to present a monthly report to the dean, who, on his part, was to report every three months to the archbishop; whoever refused obedience to these mandates was instantly removed. Extracts from the edicts of the council of Trent were printed for the clergy of the diocese, and distributed for the general information and guidance; a new edition of the Missal was also published for the purpose of abolishing all diversities in the ritual. The ecclesiastical tribunal received a new and vigorous organization, principally by the agency of Bartholomew Bodeghem of Delft. The greatest happiness of the archbishop was to find some one desirous of abjuring Protestantism; on such a person he never failed to bestow the blessing of readmission with his own hand.¹

¹ Falkenstein, Nordgaussche Alterthümer, i. 222.

The prince-bishops were further prompted to the duties of their office by other motives besides those proceeding from their connection with Rome. The spiritual princes were instigated to restore their subjects to the Catholic faith by causes similar to those affecting the secular sovereigns: nay, it was even more imperative on them to do so, since a population inclined to Protestantism would necessarily oppose a more earnest resistance to their rule on account of their ecclesiastical character.

And precisely in the ecclesiastical city of Trier it is that this momentous portion of German history opens to our view. The archbishops of Trier, like other spiritual princes, had long been at variance with their capital. In the sixteenth century, Protestantism added a new element of discord, a stubborn resistance was opposed to the ecclesiastical tribunal in particular; Jacob von Eltz was at length compelled to a formal siege of the city, and having subdued it by force of arms, he brought forward an edict of the emperor, in favour of his claims, and by these means reduced the citizens to obedience, both spiritual and temporal.

¹ Browerus, Annales Trevirenses, ii. xxii. 25, is on these points our principal authority.

Another measure taken by the archbishop was productive of very extensive effects; in the year 1572, he decreed the irrevocable exclusion of all Protestants from his court. This more particularly affected the provincial nobility, whose hopes of advancement were generally fixed on the court. The nobles thus saw their prospects destroyed, and more than one of them may probably have been induced by this circumstance to return to the ancient religion.

A neighbour of Jacob von Eltz, Daniel Brendel, elector of Mainz, was also a very good Catholic. He revived the procession of Corpus Christi, in opposition to the advice of all about him, and even officiated himself in the ceremony. He would on no account have neglected vespers, and from the affairs brought before him he invariably selected those of a spiritual character for his first attention. The Jesuits bestow high praise on this prince for the favours they received at his hands; and he sent several pupils to the "Collegium Germanicum" in Rome.¹ But he was not prepared to go to the extremities practised by Jacob von Eltz. His religious zeal was mingled with a certain character of irony. On establishing the Jesuits in his electorate, he was opposed by remonstrance from some of his feudal tenants. "How!" said he, "you endure me, who fall so far short of my duty, and you will not tolerate the Jesuits, who perform theirs so perfectly!"² The answer he returned to the Jesuits when they urged him to the complete extirpation of Protestantism has not been reported to us; but we know that he continued to suffer Lutherans and Calvinists to retain a permanent residence both in the city and at court; and in some places he even tolerated the evangelical ritual.³ But this probably may have been only because he did not believe himself strong enough to suppress it. In a more remote part of his dominions, where no powerful and warlike neighbours, such as the counts palatine of the Rhine, were near to hold him in check, he proceeded to very decisive measures. The restoration of Catholicism in Eichsfeld was his work. There also the Protestant creed had gained firm hold by favour of the nobles, and had even made its way into Heiligenstadt, notwithstanding the presence of the chapter which held the patronage of all the livings; a Lutheran preacher was settled there, and the communion was administered in both kinds. On one occasion only twelve citizens of any consideration received the sacrament at Easter according to the Catholic forms.¹ Things were in this position, when, in the year 1574, the archbishop appeared personally at Eichsfeld, accompanied by two Jesuits, for the purpose of holding a visitation of the churches. He proceeded to no act of violence, but took measures that proved entirely effectual. He removed the Protestant preachers from Heiligenstadt, and founded a college of Jesuits there. He dismissed no member from the council, but he prevented the admission of Protestants for the future by making a slight addition to the oath taken by the councillors; in virtue of which they bound themselves to obey his grace the elector, whether in spiritual or temporal matters. But the most essential change made by Daniel Brendel was the appointment of Leopold von Stralendorf, a most zealous Catholic, to the office of high bailiff. This functionary did not scruple to enforce the milder measures of his master in a spirit of excessive rigour, adopted on his own responsibility; and in a consistent administration of twenty-six years, he restored the Catholic faith to its supremacy in town and country. Disregarding the remonstrances of the nobles, he expelled the Protestant preachers from the territory, and appointed pupils from the new Jesuit college in their place.

¹ Serarius, Moguntiacarum Rerum Libri V; in the section relating to Daniel, especially cap. viii., xi., xxii., xxxiii.

² Valerandus Sartorius in Serarius, p. 921.

³ The complaint of Robert Turner, who looked for a Boniface, and found a "principem politicum" only. In Serarius, p. 947.

Another ecclesiastical prince had already given the example of similar proceedings in that part of the country.

In the diocese of Fulda, the evangelical forms of worship had been tolerated by six abbots in succession; and the young abbot, Balthazar von Dernbach, surnamed Gravel, had promised, at his election in the year 1570, to allow the continuance of this practice; but whether it was that the favour shewn him by the papal court had inflamed his ambition, or that he considered the restoration of Catholicism likely to increase his very insignificant authority, or that his convictions had indeed become decidedly changed, certain it is, that he gradually displayed, not only aversion, but even hostility to the Protestant tenets. He first called in the Jesuits, not that he was acquainted with the order, nor had he ever seen one of its colleges; he knew them by common report only, and by the accounts he had received from a few students of the college of Trier; but his purpose may perhaps have been confirmed by the recommendations of Daniel Brendel. The Jesuits accepted his invitation very cordially; Mainz and Trier combined to establish a colony in Fulda; the abbot built them a house and school, and granted them a pension. He himself, being still extremely ignorant, accepted instruction at their hands.¹

¹ Johann Wolf, Geschichte und Beschreibung von Heiligenstadt, p. 59.

The first result of these proceedings on the part of the abbot was a dispute with his chapter, which possessed the right to a voice in such matters, and entirely disapproved the introduction of the Jesuits. He soon after attacked the city also, having found a favourable occasion for doing so.

The parish priest of Fulda, who had hitherto preached evangelical doctrines, returned to Catholicism. He recommenced the use of Latin in the rite of baptism, and the administration of the communion in one kind only. The inhabitants, long accustomed to the reformed ritual, did not willingly consent to abandon it; and demanded the removal of the priest. Their request, as may be supposed, received no attention. Not only was the Catholic ritual strictly observed in the cathedral, but the Protestant preachers were expelled one after another from the remaining churches also, and Jesuits appointed in their place. The abbot had already dismissed his Protestant councillors and officers, to replace them by others of the Catholic creed.

It was in vain that the nobles remonstrated. The abbot assumed an appearance of surprise, and observed that he hoped they did not mean to dictate the measures which he should pursue for the government of the land committed by God to his rule. Some of the more powerful princes of the empire sent embassies to dissuade him from these innovations, and to request the dismissal of the Jesuits; but he remained immovable; nay, he further proceeded to menaces against the knights of his dominions, who asserted a sort of claim to hold immediately of the emperor, which was a privilege that would have been much restricted had the ecclesiastical sovereign been able to enforce obedience in matters of religion.

¹ Reiffenberg: Historia Societatis Jesu ad Rhenum inferiorem, i. vi. ii.; who makes an addition in this passage to the account of Sacchinus (iii. vii. 68), from a treatise drawn up for him by the Jesuit Feurer. On the Protestant side, complaints of the city of Fulda, and of the knights of that diocese, in Lehmann, De Pace Religionis, ii. ix. 257.

It was thus that Catholicism, which might have been thought conquered, once more arose in Germany with renewed strength. The most varied motives contributed to this result. The revival of Church discipline by the edicts of the council of Trent largely contributed, but motives of internal policy were more active than all others, since it was obvious that a sovereign would be much more powerful if his subjects were attached to his own creed. It is true that the restoration of the Church had at first included separate points only, but these soon presented a boundless prospect to the spirit of reform. That no more effectual resistance was offered to the proceedings of the spiritual princes, must in itself have been of infinite moment. At the peace of Augsburg an attempt had been made to secure the Protestant communities inhabiting ecclesiastical territories, by an express declaration of the emperor: the spiritual sovereigns now refused to acknowledge this declaration, and would in no case be restricted by it. The imperial power was neither sufficiently strong nor sufficiently resolute to come to any effectual decision regarding it, still less to make it respected. Even in the diets of the empire there was not the energy or the unanimity that would have been required to procure the adoption of measures in its favour. The most important changes occurred without a word of remark, almost without observation; they were not even mentioned by the historians of the period, but passed as things inevitable and that could not be otherwise.

5. TROUBLES IN THE NETHERLANDS AND FRANCE

While the efforts of Catholicism were producing results so important and extensive in Germany, they were put forth with equal vigour in the Netherlands and in France, though in a manner entirely different.

The principal distinction was, that a powerful central authority existed in each of these last-named countries, which took immediate part in every movement, assumed the guidance of all religious enterprises, and was itself directly affected by any opposition offered to a religious undertaking.

There was, consequently, more unity in the different relations of the states, a more perfect combination of means, and more effectual energy of action.

The many and varied measures taken by Philip to enforce obedience in the Netherlands at the beginning of his reign are well known: he was compelled to abandon most of them, one after another, but he clung with stubborn tenacity and inflexible rigour to all that had been framed for the maintenance of Catholicism and religious uniformity.

By the institution of new bishoprics and archbishoprics, he completely remodelled the ecclesiastical constitution of the country. In these proceedings he would permit himself to be checked by no remonstrance or appeal to the rights which he was unquestionably invading.

These bishoprics acquired redoubled importance from the increased severity enforced on the discipline of the Church by the council of Trent. Philip II had adopted the decrees of the council after a short deliberation, and had then proclaimed them in the Netherlands. The daily life of the people, who had hitherto found means to avoid any violent restraints, was now to be placed under the most rigorous supervision, and subjected to the minute observance of forms from which they had believed themselves about to be entirely emancipated.

In addition to this came the penal laws, of which so many had been issued in the Netherlands under the preceding government; and the zeal of the Inquisitors, whom the newly-erected tribunal of Rome was daily stimulating to increased activity.

The people of the Netherlands left no means untried that might induce the king to moderate his rigour; and he did appear at times to be more leniently disposed. Count Egmont thought he had received assurance of this during his sojourn in Spain: it was, nevertheless, scarcely to be hoped for. We have already observed that the authority of Philip throughout his dominions reposed on a religious basis. Had he made concessions to the inhabitants of the Netherlands, they would have been demanded in Spain, where he could not possibly have granted them. He, too, was subjected—a fact we must not refuse to acknowledge—to the pressure of an inevitable necessity. This was, besides, the period when the accession and first measures of Pius V were exciting increased zeal through all Catholic Christendom. Philip II felt an unusual inclination towards this pontiff, and gave an attentive ear to his exhortations. The attack of the Turks on Malta had just been repulsed, and the more bigoted party, enemies to the Protestant Netherlanders, may have availed themselves of the impression produced by this victory, as the prince of Orange suspected, to lead the king into some violent resolution.¹ Let it suffice to say, that towards the end of the year 1565, an edict was promulgated surpassing all preceding ones in severity.

The penal enactments—the decrees of the council, and those of the provincial synods held subsequently—were to be enforced without remission: the Inquisitors alone were to take cognizance of religious offences; all civil authorities being enjoined to render them assistance; a commissioner was appointed to watch over the execution of this edict, with orders to give a report every three months.²

The effect of these decrees was manifestly to introduce a spiritual domination, if not exactly similar to that of Spain, yet, at least, resembling the rule of Italy.

Among the first results that ensued, was that the people took up arms; the destruction of images began, and the whole country was in the wildest commotion. There was a moment when the authorities seemed about to yield; but, as is usual in such cases, acts of violence defeated the end proposed by them. The moderate and peaceable inhabitants were alarmed, and gave assistance to the government. Victory remained with the Duchess of Parma, the Regent, and having taken possession of the rebellious towns, she found herself in a position to impose an oath on the public officers, and even on the feudatories of the king, by which they formally pledged themselves to the maintenance of the Catholic faith, and to an armed resistance to heretics.¹

¹ The prince entertained suspicions of Granvelle. See his letters in the Archives de la Maison d'Orange-Nassau, i. 289.

² Strada, after a formula of the 18th Dec. 1565, lib. iv. p. 94.

Even this did not suffice for Philip II. It was the unhappy moment when the catastrophe of his son Don Carlos occurred: he was more than usually severe and unbending. The pope repeated his exhortations that no concession to the disadvantage of Catholicism should be made; and Philip assured his holiness, that he would not suffer a single root of the noxious plant to remain in the Netherlands; either he would uphold the Catholic faith in all its purity, or would consent to lose those provinces altogether.² For the better fulfilment of these intentions, he sent his best general, the duke of Alva, with a formidable army, into the Netherlands, even after the troubles had been allayed.

Let us examine the moving principle by which the proceedings of Alva were regulated.

The duke was convinced that all might be arranged in a country disturbed by revolutionary movements, when once the chiefs had been disposed of. That Charles V, after so many important victories, had been very nearly driven from the German empire, he attributed to the forbearance of that monarch, who had spared his enemies when they had fallen into his hands. Much has been written concerning the alliance entered into between the French and Spaniards at the congress of Bayonne in 1565, and the measures concerted there; but of all that has been said of this convention, thus much only is certain, that the duke of Alva exhorted the French queen to disembarass herself of the Huguenot leaders, by whatever means she could find. What he then advised, he now made no scruple of putting in practice. Philip had intrusted him with some blank warrants, bearing the royal signature. The first use he made of them was to arrest Egmont and Horn, whom he assumed to have been implicated in the recent insurrections. "May it please your sacred Catholic majesty," thus begins the letter which he wrote to the king on this occasion, and which seems to imply that he had no express command for the arrest of the counts, "on my arrival in Brussels, I procured the necessary information from the proper quarter, and thereupon secured the person of Count Egmont. I have also caused Count Horn and some others to be imprisoned."¹ It will, perhaps, be asked, why he sentenced these prisoners a year afterwards to be executed? It was not because he had received proof of their guilt from the trial; the blame attached to them was rather that of not having prevented the disturbances than of having caused them; nor was it by command of the king, who rather left it to Alva to decide on the execution, or not, as he should consider expedient. The cause of their death was as follows:—A small body of Protestants had made an incursion into the country. They had effected nothing of moment, but had gained some little advantage at Heiligerlee; and the duke of Arenberg, a general of high reputation in the royal army, had been left dead on the field. In his letters to the king, Alva said that he had perceived the people to be thrown into a ferment by this mischance; that they were becoming bold; and he considered it expedient to shew that he was in nowise afraid of them. He wished also to deprive them of any wish they might have to excite new commotions with a view to rescue the prisoners; and had, therefore, resolved on permitting the execution to proceed immediately. And thus did these noble men lose their lives, though no guilt worthy of death could be found in them; their sole crime consisted in the defence of the ancient liberties of their country. They were sacrificed, not to any principle of justice, but rather to the momentary considerations of a cruel policy. The duke remembered Charles V, whose errors he was determined to avoid.¹

¹ Brandt, Histoire de la Réformation des Pays-Bas, i. 156.

² Cavalli, Dispaccio di Spagna, 7 Aug. 1567: "Rispose il re, che quanto alle cose della religione S. Sta stasse di buon animo, che ovvero si han da perder tutti quei stati o che si conserverà in essi la vera cattolica religione, nè comporterà che vi rimanghi, per quanto potrà far lui, alcuna radice di mala pianta."

¹ Dispaccio di Cavalli, 16 Sett. The late Regent complained to the king of the arrests, when Philip replied that he had not commanded them. In proof of this he shewed her the letter he had received from Alva, and the passage adduced to prove his assertion is before us; it runs thus: "Sacra cattolica Maestà, da poi ch' io gionsi in Bruxelles, pigliai le information da chi dovea delle cose di qua, onde poi mi son assicurato del conte di Agmon e fatto ritener il conte d'Orno, con alquanti altri. Sarà ben che V.M. per bon 'rispetto ordini ancor lei che sia fatto l'istesso di Montigni (who was then in Spain) e suo adjutante di camera." Thereupon followed the arrest of Montigni.

We see that Alva was cruel from principle. Who could hope for mercy from the fearful tribunal that he erected, under the name of "Council of Disturbances?" He ruled the provinces by arrests and executions: he razed the houses of the condemned to the ground, and confiscated their property. He pursued his ecclesiastical designs together with his political purposes. The ancient power of the estates was reduced to a mere name, Spanish troops occupied the country, and a citadel was erected in the most important mercantile city. The duke insisted with obstinate despotism on the exaction of the most odious taxes; and in Spain, whence also he drew large sums, people asked with surprise, what he could do with all the money. It is, however, true, that the country was obedient; no malcontent ventured to move; every trace of Protestantism disappeared; and those who had been driven into neighbouring districts, remained perfectly quiet.

"Monsignore," said a member of Philip's council to the papal nuncio during these events, "are you now satisfied with the proceedings of the king?" "Perfectly satisfied," replied the nuncio with a smile.

¹ Cavalli, 3rd July, 1568, gives this despatch also in the extract. It is, if possible, still more remarkable than that before cited. "Capitò qui l'avviso della giustitia fatta in Fiandra contra di quelli poveri signori prigionì, intorno alla quale scrive il D. d'Alva, che havendo facoltà di S. M. di far tal esecuzione o soprastare secondo che havesse riputato piu espediente del suo servitio, che però vedendo li popoli un poco alterati et insuperbiti per la morte d'Arenberg e rotta di quelli Spagnoli, havea giudicato tempo opportuno e necessario per tal effetto per dimostrar di non temer di loro in conto alcuno, e poner con questo terrore a molti levandoli la speranza di tumultuar per la loro liberatione, e fuggir di cascar nell' errore nel quale incorse l'imperatore Carlo, il qual per tener vivo Saxonia e Langravio diede occasione di nova congiura, per la quale S. M. fu cacciata con poca dignità della Germania e quasi dell' impero."

Alva himself believed he had performed a master-stroke, and it was not without contempt that he regarded the French government, which had not been able to make itself master in its own territory.

In France, after the legal concessions made to Protestantism, a strong reaction against it had taken place.

It proceeded from the nobility, who would not brook so great a deviation from the prevailing system, both religious and social, nor give a free hand to the government as it was then constituted. They succeeded, however, by persuasion or force, in gaining over the government and in carrying out an alteration in policy which was fraught with bloody results. The Protestants also had at their head powerful and determined leaders who answered force with force.

In itself the outbreak of civil war and the close connection between the religious interests and the political and court factions, could not be advantageous to the progress of Protestantism. So long as the adherents of reform kept the peace, everything was in their favour. But when, carried away by their leaders, they took up arms, and committed those acts of violence that are inseparable from a state of warfare, they lost their advantage in public opinion. "What kind of religion is this?" men asked: "Where has Christ commanded the pillage of our neighbour, and the shedding of his blood?" When the city of Paris at length found it needful to assume an attitude of defence against the attacks of Condé, who appeared as the leader of the Huguenots, all public bodies displayed a disposition adverse to Protestantism; the population of the city capable of bearing arms was organized as a military body, and the officers appointed to command this force were required above all things to be Catholics. The members of the university and of the parliament, with the very numerous class of advocates, were compelled to subscribe a confession of faith, the articles of which were purely Catholic. Every feature of town life took on an anti-protestant colour.

It was under the influence of this change in public opinion that the Jesuits established themselves in France. Their commencement was on a very small scale; they had to content themselves with colleges thrown open to them by a few ecclesiastical dignitaries, their partisans, in Billon and Tournon, places remote from the centre of the kingdom, and where nothing effectual could be accomplished. In the larger towns, more particularly in Paris, they at first encountered the most determined opposition; above all from the Sorbonne, the parliament, and the archbishop, who all believed their own interests liable to be prejudiced by the privileges and character of the order. But they gradually acquired the favour of the more zealous Catholics, and especially of the court, which was unwearied in commending them for "their exemplary lives and pure doctrines, by which many apostates had been brought back to the faith, and East and West induced to acknowledge the presence of the Lord."¹ Thus at length they succeeded in removing all impediments; and in the year 1564 were admitted to the privilege of teaching. In Lyons they had already made their position secure. They had the good fortune, whether by their merit or mere chance, to include from the first several men of remarkable talents among their members. To the Huguenot preachers they opposed Edmund Augier, who was born in France, but educated in Rome under Ignatius Loyola; and of whom the Protestants themselves are reported to have said, that, had he not worn Catholic vestments, there would never have existed a more perfect orator. An extraordinary impression was produced both by his preaching and writing. In Lyons, more particularly, the Huguenots were completely defeated, their preachers were exiled, their churches destroyed, and their books burnt. For the Jesuits, on the contrary, in the year 1563, a magnificent college was erected. They had a distinguished professor also, Maldonat, whose exposition of the Bible attracted the youth of the country in multitudes, and enchained their attention. From these great cities they extended themselves over the kingdom in all directions; they formed establishments in Toulouse and Bordeaux. Wherever they appeared, the number of Catholic communicants was observed to increase. The catechism of Augier had extraordinary success; within the space of eight years, thirty-eight thousand copies of it were sold in Paris alone.¹

¹ In a manuscript in the Berlin Library, MSS. Gall. n. 75, the following document will be found among others: "Délibérations et consultations au parlement de Paris, touchant l'establissement des Jesuites en France." In this are especially given the messages of the court to the parliament in favour of the Jesuits. "Infracta et ferocia pectora," we are told, "gladio fidei acuto penetrarunt."

In fact, the Catholic spirit of the French, which was directly opposed to the Huguenots, began to show activity in all directions. When the Huguenots, in fear lest a fate similar to that of the people of the Netherlands should befall them, again took up arms, and secured for themselves a favourable edict of pacification, many French towns hesitated to carry it out; in the Provinces the different classes combined to form unions for the preservation of the Catholic religion, which even threatened the government, if it adopted an opposite policy. But Catherine de' Medici, indignant that the Huguenots had taken up arms anew, was already much inclined to make her power felt. The example of Alva shewed how much could be accomplished by inflexible determination. The pope continually exhorted her to repress the insolence of the rebels, to arrest their progress, and no longer to endure their existence. At length he accompanied his admonitions by the permission to alienate Church property, by which the treasury gained a million and a half of livres.² Accordingly, Catherine de' Medici, following the example given the year before by the Regent of the Netherlands, imposed an oath on the French nobility, by which they bound themselves to abjure every engagement contracted without the previous knowledge of the king.³ She demanded the dismissal of all magistrates from the cities which were suspected of favouring the new doctrines. In September, 1568, she announced to Philip that she would tolerate no other religion but the Catholic, and war instantly burst forth.

¹ This information is found in Orlandinus, and the authors who have continued his work, pars i. lib. vi. n. 30; ii. iv. 84; iii. iii. 169, et seq. Juvencius, v. 24, 769, gives a biography of Augier.

² Catena, Vita di Pio V, p. 79.

³ The oath is given by Serranus, Commentarii de Statu Religionis in Regno Galliae, iii. 153.

It was entered on with extraordinary zeal by the Catholic party. At the request of the pope, Philip of Spain sent the French an auxiliary force of practised troops under experienced leaders. Pius V caused collections to be made in the States of the Church, and gathered contributions from the Italian princes ; nay, he himself despatched a small body of troops across the Alps ; that same army to whose leader he gave the ferocious command to kill every Huguenot that might fall into his hands, and grant quarter to none.

The Huguenots also drew their forces together ; they too were full of religious zeal, and looked on the papal soldiers as the army of Antichrist arrayed against them. They too gave no quarter, and were equally provided with foreign aid. They were nevertheless entirely defeated at Moncontour.

With what exultation did Pius V receive the Huguenot standards that were sent him after the battle ; how joyfully did he place them in the churches of St. Peter and St. John Lateran ! He conceived the most daring hopes. It was at this moment that he pronounced the sentence of excommunication against Queen Elizabeth. He even flattered himself with the hope of leading an expedition against England in person.

So far he was, however, not permitted to proceed.

As had so frequently occurred before, a revulsion of opinion now took place in the court of France, and this, though occasioned by trifling circumstances of a personal nature only, yet brought about great changes in matters of the highest importance.

The king became envious of the honour gained by his brother the duke of Anjou, from the defeat of the Huguenots at Moncontour, where he had commanded the troops ; and of the influence acquired by the duke from the repose he had thus procured to the country. He was confirmed in this feeling by those around him, who were equally jealous of Anjou's followers, and who feared lest power should go hand in hand with the honour they had acquired. Not only were the advantages gained followed up with the utmost indifference, and after long delay ; but in opposition to the high Catholic party led by Anjou, another and more moderate party appeared at court ; which adopted a line of policy altogether different, made peace with the Huguenots, and invited the Protestant leaders to the court. In 1569, the French, in alliance with Spain and the pope, had sought to overthrow the queen of England; in the summer of 1572, we see them in league with that queen to wrest the Netherlands from Spain.

Meanwhile, these changes were too sudden and too imperfectly matured, to have consistency or duration. The most violent explosion followed, and affairs resumed their previous direction.

There can be no doubt that Catherine de' Medici, while entering with a certain degree of warmth and earnestness into the policy and plans of the dominant party, which favoured her interests, so far as they appeared likely to assist in placing her youngest son Alençon on the English throne, was yet concerting the measures requisite for executing a stroke of policy directly opposed to them. She did her utmost to draw the Huguenots to Paris; numerous as they were, they were there surrounded and held in check by a population far more numerous, in a state of military organization, and easily excited to fanaticism. She had previously given a very significant intimation to the pope of her purpose in this proceeding, but had she still been in doubt, the occurrences of the moment were such as must at once have determined her. The Huguenots were on the point of gaining over the king himself; they were apparently supplanting the authority of the queen-mother, and in this danger she hesitated no longer; with the irresistible and magic power that she exercised over her children, she aroused all the latent fanaticism of the king; it cost her but a word to make the people take to arms; that word she spoke. Of the eminent Huguenots, each one was pointed out to his personal enemy, and given over to his vengeance. Catherine had declared herself to wish for the death of six men only; the deaths of these alone would she take upon her conscience. The number massacred was fifty thousand.¹

Thus, all that the Spaniards had perpetrated in the

¹ For the sake of brevity, I here refer the reader to my dissertation on the Massacre of St. Bartholomew in the Histor. Polit. Zeitschrift ii. 581, in the Sämtliche Werke xii. 97.

Netherlands was exceeded by the French. What the first brought about gradually, with deliberate calculation, and with a certain observance of legal forms, the latter accomplished in the heat of passion, in defiance of all forms of law, and by the aid of a populace roused to a fury of fanaticism. The result appeared to be the same. Not one leader was left whose name might serve as a point round which the scattered Huguenots could gather ; many fled, a large number surrendered ; place after place returned to attendance at the mass, the preachers were silenced. With pleasure Philip II saw himself imitated and surpassed ; he offered Charles IX, who had now for the first time earned a right to be called the most Christian king, to assist the completion of his undertaking by the power of his arms. Pope Gregory XIII celebrated this great event by a solemn procession to the church of San Luigi. The Venetians, who seemed to have no particular interest in the matter, expressed in official despatches to their ambassador, their satisfaction at " this favour of God."

But can it be possible that crimes of a character so sanguinary can ever succeed ? Are they not in too flagrant opposition to the more profound mysteries of human events, to the undefined, yet inviolable and ever active principles that govern the order of nature ? Men may blind themselves for a time, but they cannot disturb the moral laws on which their existence reposes ; these rule with a necessity as inevitable as that which regulates the course of the stars.

6. RESISTANCE OF THE PROTESTANTS IN THE NETHERLANDS, FRANCE, AND GERMANY

Machiavelli advises his prince to execute the cruelties he shall deem necessary in rapid succession, but gradually to permit more lenient measures to follow. It would almost seem that the Spaniards had sought to follow this advice to the letter, in the Netherlands.

They appeared to be themselves at length of opinion, that property enough had been confiscated, heads enough struck off, and that the time for mercy had arrived. In the year 1572, the Venetian ambassador at Madrid declares his conviction that the prince of Orange would obtain his pardon if he would ask for it. The king received the deputies of the Netherlands very favourably, when they arrived with a petition for the repeal of the impost of the tenth penny, and even thanked them for their pains. He had determined to recall Alva, and to replace him by a more clement governor.

But it was now too late. Immediately after the conclusion of the treaty between France and England which had preceded the massacre of St. Bartholomew, the insurrection broke out. Alva had believed his work at an end, but the struggle was in fact only then beginning. He defeated the enemy whenever he met them in the open field, but in the towns of Holland and Zealand, where the religious excitement had been most profound, and where Protestantism had attained to a more effectual organization, he encountered a force of resistance that he could not overcome.

In Haarlem, when all means of supporting life were consumed, even to the grass growing between the stones, the inhabitants resolved to cut their way through the besiegers with their wives and children. The dissensions prevailing in their garrison compelled them at last to surrender, but they had shewn that the Spaniards might be resisted. The people of Alkmar declared themselves for the prince of Orange at the moment when the enemy appeared before their gates: their defence was heroic as their resolution, not a man would leave his post, however severely wounded; before the walls of Alkmar the Spaniards received their first effectual repulse. The country breathed again, and new courage entered the hearts of the people.

The men of Leyden declared, that rather than yield they would devour their left arms to enable themselves to continue the defence with their right. They took the bold resolution of breaking down their dams and calling to their aid the waves of the North Sea. Their misery had reached its utmost extremity, when a north-west wind, setting in at the critical moment, laid the country under water to the depth of several feet, and drove the enemy from their borders.

The French Protestants had also regained their courage ; no sooner did they perceive that their government, notwithstanding the savage massacre it had committed, displayed irresolution, procrastinated and adopted contradictory measures, than they again took arms and war soon burst forth anew. La Rochelle and Sancerre defended themselves as Leyden and Alkmar had done,—the preachers of peace were heard exhorting men to arms,—women shared in the combat with their husbands and brothers. It was the heroic age of Protestantism in western Europe.

The acts of cruelty, committed or sanctioned by the most powerful princes, were met in various nameless points by a resistance which had its secret origin in the most profound religious convictions, and which no force could overcome.

It is not our purpose at this time to give the details and follow the vicissitudes of the wars in France and the Netherlands,—this would lead us too far from our principal object,—they are besides to be found in many other books ; suffice it to say that the Protestants maintained their ground.

In the year 1573, and again in the following years, the French government was repeatedly compelled to enter into negotiations, from which the Huguenots gained a renewal of former concessions.

In the Netherlands, the power of the government had fallen to ruin in the year 1576 ; the Spanish troops, not receiving their regular pay, were in open insurrection, and all the provinces had united against them, those which had hitherto maintained their allegiance with those which had revolted, the districts remaining in a great measure Catholic with those entirely Protestant. The States-general took the government into their own hands, appointed captains-general, governors, and magistrates, and garrisoned the fortified places with their own troops in place of the king's.¹ The treaty of Ghent was concluded, by which provinces pledged themselves to expel the Spaniards and keep them out of the country. Philip of Spain sent his brother, who might be considered a Netherlander, to govern them as Charles V had done: but Don John was not even acknowledged until he had promised to fulfil the principal conditions laid before him; he was compelled to accept the treaty of Ghent, and to dismiss the Spanish troops; and no sooner did he make the first movement to free himself from the restraints that fettered him, than all parties rose against him. He was declared an enemy of the country, and the chiefs of the provinces called another prince of his house to take his place.

¹ This turn of affairs is made particularly clear in Tassis, iii. 12-19.

The principle of local government overcame the monarchical: the native power was victorious over the Spanish.

From this state of things various consequences necessarily arose. The northern provinces, which had conducted the opposition, and thereby rendered the existing circumstances possible, at once acquired a natural preponderance in all that related to the war and the government; it thus followed that the reformed religion was propagated through the whole extent of the Netherlands. It was received in Mechlin, Bruges, and Ypres. The people of Antwerp divided their churches between the two confessions, and the Catholics were occasionally compelled to content themselves with the choirs of those churches which they had so lately held in sole possession. In Ghent the Protestant tendency was mingled with a civil commotion, and obtained entire supremacy. The treaty of Ghent had guaranteed the maintenance of the Catholic church, in its former condition, but the States-general now issued an edict by which equal liberty was secured to both confessions. Thenceforth Protestant opinions made rapid advance, even in those provinces that were principally Catholic, and there seemed good cause for the expectation that they would eventually become predominant throughout the country.

How changed was the position now held by the prince of Orange. He had but lately been an exile, whose best hope was to obtain pardon; he was now possessed of a well-established power in the northern provinces, was sheriff (Ruwart) of Brabant, all-powerful in the assembly of the states, and acknowledged as their chief and leader by a great religious and political party, which was making rapid progress. He was besides in close alliance with all the Protestants of Europe, and more especially with his neighbours the Germans.

The aggressions of the Catholics were resisted in Germany also with a force on the Protestant part which seemed to promise the most important results.

The effects of this resistance were apparent in the general transactions of the empire, in the assemblies of the electors, and in the imperial diets, although there the German system of conducting affairs prevented any adequate results from appearing. They were most sensibly felt, as had been the aggressions in the several territories and distinct sovereignties into which Germany was divided.

It was in the spiritual principalities, as we have seen, that the question was most earnestly debated. There was scarcely one wherein the prince had not attempted to restore Catholicism to its ancient supremacy. The Protestants, who felt their own strength, retorted with efforts equally comprehensive, and laboured with equal energy to bring the ecclesiastical sovereignties themselves to their own opinions.

In the year 1577, Gebhard Truchsess ascended the archiepiscopal throne of Cologne. This was to be ascribed in great measure to the influence possessed by Count Nuenar over the chapter, and perfectly well did that powerful Protestant know who it was that he recommended. It is certain that Gebhard's acquaintance with Agnes von Mansfeld, which is said to have influenced his decision, was not required to determine him against the Catholics. Even at his solemn entry into Cologne, when the clergy met him in procession, he did not alight from his horse, as was the established custom, to kiss the cross. He appeared in the church in a military dress, nor would he consent to perform high mass. He attached himself from the very first to the prince of Orange, and his principal councillors were Calvinists.¹ Further, he did not scruple to mortgage land in order to raise troops; was careful to secure the attachment of the nobles, and favoured certain of the guilds of Cologne, which had begun to oppose themselves to Catholic usages; all circumstances tending to shew the existence of that purpose which he afterwards manifested openly—of converting his spiritual sovereignty into a secular electorate.

Gebhard Truchsess still conformed, occasionally at least, and in externals, to the Catholic faith. The adjacent bishoprics of Westphalia and Lower Saxony, on the contrary, fell, as we have already observed, immediately into the hands of Protestants. The elevation of Duke Henry of Saxe-Lauenburg was most especially important. He had been elected while yet very young, and though a firm Lutheran, to the archbishopric of Bremen; some time after to the bishopric of Osnabrück, and, in 1577, to that of Paderborn.² Even in Münster, a large party, including all the younger members of the chapter, was attached to his interests, and but for the direct intervention of Gregory XIII, who declared a resignation actually made to be null and void, he would have been elevated to that see also, in spite of all efforts made to prevent it by the rigidly Catholic party. Indeed, these last were still unable to prevail so far as to secure the election of any other bishop.

It is obvious that a powerful impulse must have been given to Protestant opinions in Rhenish Westphalia—where they had before been widely propagated—by this disposition on the part of the ecclesiastical chiefs. There needed only some fortunate combination of circumstances, some well-directed stroke, to secure the decided predominance of Protestantism in that district.

All Germany would have felt the influence of this event. The same contingencies were probable in regard to the bishoprics of Upper Germany, as those we have seen occurring in the lower part of the empire; and, even in the territories where the restoration had begun, resistance to its efforts was far from being suppressed.

¹ Maffei, Annali di Gregorio XIII, t. i. p. 331.

² Hamelmann, Oldenburgisches Chronikon, p. 436.

How keenly was this truth experienced by the Abbot Balthasar of Fulda ! When it was seen that the intercessions of neighbouring princes, and the complaints laid before the diet, produced no effect, but that, in disregard of all, the abbot persisted in completing his restoration of the Catholic faith, and went about enforcing his regulations throughout the abbacy, he was one day encountered at Hamelburg, whither he had gone in the summer of 1576, for the promotion of these very purposes, was assailed by his armed nobles, and imprisoned in his own house. Finding that all measures were taken to oppose him, that his neighbours beheld his embarrassment with satisfaction, and that the bishop of Würzburg was even assisting his enemies, he resigned himself, perforce, to the abdication of the government, and was deprived of his dominions.¹

In Bavaria also, Duke Albert found his purposes still far from being accomplished. He complained to the pope that his nobility would rather forego the sacrament altogether, than receive it in one kind.

But it was of much higher importance that Protestantism was making continual progress in the Austrian provinces, and was gradually acquiring an acknowledged and legalized existence. Under the wisely-conducted government of Maximilian II, it not only gained a fixed position in Austria Proper, both east and west of the Ens, but had also extended throughout the neighbouring districts. That emperor had scarcely redeemed the county of Glatz from the dukes of Bavaria, who had held it in mortgage (1567), before the nobles, public officers, towns, and, finally, the larger part of the people, went over to the evangelical confession. Hans von Pubschütz, the captain-general, established a Protestant consistory by his own authority ; and, upheld by this, he sometimes proceeded farther than the emperor would have desired. Gradually, the estates there also obtained a high degree of power and independence. This was altogether the most prosperous epoch of the county; the mines were thriving, the towns were rich and flourishing, the nobles well educated and orderly, waste lands were reclaimed in all directions, and villages were established among them.¹ The church of Albendorf, to which, in the present day, thousands of pilgrims annually proceed for the purpose of kissing an old image of the Virgin, was at that time for sixty years occupied by Protestant preachers.² Some time later, only nine Catholic burghers were counted in the capital, while there were three hundred of the evangelical faith. We cannot be surprised that Pope Pius V should feel inexpressible aversion to the Emperor Maximilian. On one occasion, when the conversation turned on the war that sovereign was engaged in with the Turks, Pius declared outright that he knew not to which side he least wished the victory.³ Protestantism continued under these circumstances to make progress even in the interior provinces of Austria, over which the emperor did not exercise immediate control. In the year 1568, twenty-four evangelical pastors were already counted in Carinthia; and in 1571, the capital of Styria had only one Catholic in its council. Not that the evangelical doctrines found a support in this country from the Archduke Charles, its governor: on the contrary, this prince introduced the Jesuits, and promoted their efforts to the utmost of his power, but Protestant opinions prevailed in the estates.⁴ In the diets, where religious affairs were mingled with the administration of government and the defence of the country,

¹ Schannat, Historia Fuldensis, pars iii. p. 268. A letter from the abbot to Pope Gregory, dated Aug. 1, 1576, is particularly remarkable. Schannat gives it from the Archives of the Vatican. "Clamantes," he says of the threats of his enemies, "nisi consentiam, ut administratio ditionis meae episcopo tradatur, non aliter se me ac canem rabidum interfecturos, tum Saxoniae et Hassiae principes in meum gregem immissuros."

¹ Joseph Kögler's Chronik von Glatz, bd. i. heft ii. p. 72. The author was a Catholic parish priest; his work is very sensible and useful.

² From 1563 to 1623: Documentirte Beschreibung von Albendorf (an earlier printed fragment of the same chronicle), p. 36.

³ Tiepolo, Relatione di Pio IV e V: he further adds, "In proposito della morte del principe di Spagna apertamente disse il papa haverla sentita con grandissimo dispiacere, perche non vorria che li stati del re cattolico capitassero in mano de' Tedeschi." [Speaking of the death of the Spanish prince, the pope said he had heard of it with great regret, because it would grieve him to see the dominions of the Catholic king fall into the hands of the Germans.]

⁴ Socher, Historia Societatis Jesu Provinciae Austriae, i. iv. 166, 184; v. 33.

they had the upper hand ; for every concession they made in political matters, they demanded religious immunities in return. At the diet of Bruck on the Muhr, held in 1578, the archduke was compelled to accord the free exercise of the evangelical religion, not only in the domains of the nobles and landed proprietors, where he could not have prevented it, but also in the four important towns of Grätz, Judenburg, Klagenfurt, and Laibach.¹ Thereupon the Protestant institutions were regularly organized in those provinces as in the imperial territories. A Protestant administration of the churches was established ; a regular system of preaching and schools arranged, on the model of that prevailing in Würtemberg. In some instances, as at St. Veit, Catholics were excluded from the municipal elections,² and were no longer admitted to provincial offices. Under favour of these circumstances, Protestantism first gained the ascendancy in a country so closely neighbouring to Italy. The impulse given by the Jesuits was here counteracted by the most steadfast opposition.

In all the provinces of Austria, of the German, Slavonic, and Hungarian tongues, with the single exception of the Tyrol, Protestantism was in 1578 the predominant religion.

It thus becomes evident that throughout Germany the progress made by Catholicism was met by successful opposition and equal progress on the part of the Protestants.

7. CONTRASTS EXHIBITED IN OTHER PARTS OF EUROPE

The epoch we are considering is indeed a most remarkable one ; the two great religious tendencies are seen once more in active conflict, with equal hope of obtaining the ascendancy.

¹ Supplication to his Imp. Rom. Maj. and intercession of the three principalities and the state, in Lehmann, De Pace Religionis, p. 461 ; a document which serves to correct the statement made by Khevenhiller, Ann. Ferdinandej, i. 6.

² Hermann in the Kärntnerische Zeitschrift, v. p. 189.

As compared with former times, the position of things had materially changed: at an earlier period each party had been willing to treat with the other; reconciliation had been attempted in Germany; a way seemed prepared for it in France; it was demanded in the Netherlands; nor did it appear to be impracticable, since toleration was in some places practised. But the spirit of opposition had now assumed a more hostile and threatening aspect. Throughout Europe the antagonist principles were, so to speak, now provoking each other to the combat. We shall be amply repaid by a slight review of the general state of things as existing in the years 1578-9.

Let us commence in the East, with Poland.

Here, also, the Jesuits had made their way, under sanction of the bishops, who sought in them for support to their own power. In the year 1569, a college was founded for them by Cardinal Hosius, bishop of Ermeland, at Braunsberg, from which many others were established in all directions.¹ They settled themselves in Pultusk and Posén likewise,—at each place with the aid of the bishop. The Lutherans of Lithuania proposed to establish a university on their own principles, and the bishop Valerian of Wilna, considering it highly essential to counteract the effect of this, erected a Jesuit school in his diocese. He was old and failing, and desired to mark his last days by this meritorious action. The first members of the society arrived in his see in the year 1570.²

Here, as in other places, the first result of these efforts merely was that Protestants took measures to maintain their influence. In the convocation diet of 1573, they carried a resolution, by virtue of which all men were secured from offence or injury on account of religious opinions.³

The bishops were compelled to submit: the example of the troubles in the Netherlands was brought forward to prove to them the dangers that might arise from their refusal.

¹ Possevinus: "ex collegio (Brunsbergensi) collegia reliqua Sarmatiae, Livoniae, Transsylvaniae prodierunt."

² Sacchinus, Historia Societatis Jesu, p. ii. lib. viii. 114; p. iii. lib. i. 112; lib. vi. 103-108.

³ Fredro, Henricus I rex Polonorum, p. 114.

The succeeding kings of Poland were also compelled to promise the maintenance of this resolution. In the year 1579, the payment of tithes to the clergy was suspended, and the nuncio declared that 1200 parish priests were rendered destitute by this regulation. A high court of judicature was established in the same year, composed of laity and clergy in equal numbers, which took cognizance even of ecclesiastical disputes. The utmost surprise was expressed in Rome that the Polish clergy should endure a tribunal so constituted.

The contest was equally animated in Sweden as in Poland, and was accompanied by very peculiar circumstances; these had immediate reference to the person of the sovereign, who was indeed the object of the struggle.

In all the sons of Gustavus Vasa—"the brood of King Gustavus," as the Swedes called them—there was a very unusual mixture of deep reflection with impetuous wilfulness, of devotional feeling with excessive violence.

The most highly cultivated of these princes was John, the second son of Gustavus. He had married a Catholic princess, Catherine of Poland, who had shared his prison, in the rigorous solitude of which he had received consolation from a Catholic priest; thus these religious disputes awakened his particular interest. The Swedish prince had studied the fathers to gain a clearer comprehension of the state of the Church from the earliest times: he looked favourably on all books treating of a possible reconciliation between the two confessions, and his attention was continually occupied by questions connected with this subject. When he became king he made, in fact, certain approaches towards the Church of Rome; he published a liturgy on the model of that sanctioned by the council of Trent, in which the Swedish divines perceived with amazement that not only the usages, but even some of the distinguishing doctrines of the Roman church were included.¹ As the intercession of the pope, as well with the Catholic princes in general, on account of the Russian war, as with the Spanish court in particular, with regard to the maternal inheritance of his wife, was likely to be essential to the interests of the Swedish monarch, he did not hesitate to send one of his nobles as ambassador to Rome; he even permitted some few Jesuits from the Netherlands to settle in Stockholm, where he committed to their charge an important institution for the education of youth.

¹ They are all to be found in the Judicium Praedicatorum Holmen-sium de publicata Liturgia, in Baaz, Inventarium Ecclesiarum Sueogoth. p. 393.

These proceedings naturally excited very sanguine hopes in Rome; and Antonio Possevin, one of the most clever men in the Society of Jesus, was selected to make a strenuous effort for the conversion of King John.

In the year 1578, Possevin arrived in Sweden: the king was not disposed to give way on all points; he demanded that marriage should be conceded to the priests, that the sacramental cup should be granted to the laity, that mass should be celebrated in the language of the country, that the Church should abandon all its claims to confiscated property, and make other concessions of similar character. Possevin was not authorized to decide on these questions; he promised only to lay the king's demands before the Apostolic See, and then hastened to insist on the dogmatical points of controversy. In regard to these he had much more success. After some few interviews, and a certain time for reflection, the king declared himself resolved to make the "professio fidei" according to the formula of the council of Trent. This profession of faith he did in fact subscribe, and then confessed. Possevin once more inquired if he submitted to the judgment of the pope in regard to the sacrament in one kind? John replied that he did so, when the Jesuit solemnly granted him absolution.

It would almost appear that this absolution was the king's most immediate object and principal wish. He had caused his brother to be put to death; it is true that the estates had previously approved that measure, still it was the death of a brother, and was accompanied by circumstances of extreme violence: the absolution he had received seemed to give peace to his mind. Possevin prayed to God that he might be permitted to turn the heart of this prince. John arose and threw himself into the arms of his confessor. "As I embrace thee," he exclaimed, "even so do I embrace the Catholic faith now and for ever." He then received the sacrament according to the Catholic ritual.

Having thus successfully accomplished his task, Possevin returned to Rome, and communicated the result to the pope : he also imparted it, under the seal of secrecy, to the most powerful Catholic sovereigns. There now remained only to take into consideration those demands of the Swedish king, on which he made the restoration of Catholicism in his dominions principally to depend. Possevin had great address, was very eloquent, and possessed considerable talent for negotiation, but he had too easily persuaded himself that his end was attained. The account he gave induced Pope Gregory to believe that no concessions were necessary ; he therefore demanded, on the contrary, that the king should declare himself freely and unconditionally a Catholic ;—charged with letters to that effect, and with indulgences for all who would return to the Roman church, the Jesuit departed on his second journey.

But the opposite party had meanwhile not remained inactive ; Protestant princes had sent warning letters to the king, for intelligence of his proceedings had spread through all Europe. Chytraeus had dedicated his work on the Confession of Augsburg to the Swedish sovereign, and had thereby produced a certain impression on that learned prince. The Protestants did not again lose sight of him.

Possevin now arrived, no more as on the previous occasion in the usual dress of civilians, but in the proper costume of his order, and bringing with him a large number of Catholic books. His very appearance seemed instantly to make an unfavourable impression. He hesitated a moment to produce the papal reply, but seeing at length that he must not venture further delay, he laid it before the king in an audience that lasted two hours. Who can penetrate the secret movements of a wavering and unsettled mind ? The monarch's self-esteem was perhaps wounded by so positive a refusal of his demands, he was doubtless convinced that nothing was to be accomplished in Sweden without the concessions he had required, and felt no disposition to abdicate his crown for the sake of religion. Enough—the audience was decisive—from that hour the king betrayed coldness and aversion towards the envoy of the pontiff. He required his Jesuit schoolmen to receive the sacrament in both kinds, and to read mass in the Swedish tongue; as they did not obey him, which indeed they could not, he refused to continue the provision he had allowed them. They left Stockholm very soon after, and their departure was doubtless not caused wholly by the plague, as they desired to have it believed. The Protestant nobles, with the king's younger brother, Charles of Sudermania, who was disposed to Calvinism, and the ambassadors of Lübeck, neglected no means that might increase this growing aversion. The sole remaining hope and stay of the Catholics was now the queen, and after her death the heir to the throne. For the time the sovereign power in Sweden continued essentially Protestant.¹

In England, the government became daily more and more firmly attached to the reformed opinions, under Queen Elizabeth. But in that kingdom there existed assailable points of a different kind; the country was filled with Catholics; not only did the Irish population adhere steadfastly to the ancient faith and ritual, but in England also there was probably one-half of the people, if not—as some have asserted—a larger proportion still attached to Catholicism. It has always occasioned surprise that the English Catholics should have submitted to the Protestant laws of Elizabeth, which they did at least during the first fifteen years of her reign. They took the oath required from them, although it was in direct opposition to the papal authority; they attended the Protestant churches, and thought they had done quite enough, if, in going and returning, they kept together and avoided the society of the Protestants.¹

¹ In the whole of this account, I confine myself to the reports of the Jesuits (which, so far as I can discover, have never been used before), as they may be found at length in Sacchini, Hist. Societatis Jesu, &c., pars iv. lib. vi. n. 64-76, and lib. vii. n. 83-111. Theiner's Schweden und seine Stellung zum heiligen Stuhl—a work which, filled with coarse invectives, has hitherto excited pity rather than attention—contains in the appendix the originals of the reports, of which excerpts are given by Sacchini, at least in part, as well as some other welcome documents. In a letter to the cardinal of Como Possevin especially blames the pretension of the king "di haver imaginato un mezzo di conciliare la chiesa et ridurla in miglior ordine, che non era; e pero la chiama inferma, dicendo ch'egli segue la trionfante e la pacifica." This was certainly altogether incompatible with the claims of the Church.

A firm conviction was nevertheless maintained in Rome of their secret attachment; all were persuaded that nothing more than opportunity or some slight advantage was required to inflame all the Catholics of the kingdom, and rouse them to resistance. Pius V had already expressed a wish that he could shed his blood in an expedition against England. The hope and thought of such an enterprise were never abandoned by Gregory XIII, who was much disposed to employ the martial spirit and exalted station of Don John of Austria for its accomplishment. To this effect he despatched his nuncio Sega, who had been with Don John in the Netherlands, into Spain, with the hope of inducing Philip II to concur in his undertaking.

But it happened that, partly from the king's disinclination to forward the ambitious views of his brother, partly from his objection to being involved in new political embarrassments, and partly from other obstacles, the whole affair came to nothing; these vast plans had to be resigned, and their projectors were forced to content themselves with less magnificent enterprises.

Pope Gregory next fixed his attention on Ireland. It was represented to him that there was no people more strictly and steadily Catholic than the Irish, but that the nation was tyrannously maltreated by the English government; that the people were despoiled, disunited, wilfully kept in a state of barbarism, and oppressed in their religious convictions; that they were thus at every moment prepared for war, and wanted nothing more than the aid of a small body of troops; with five thousand men Ireland might be conquered, since there was not a fortress in the country that could hold out more than four days.¹ The pope was easily persuaded to believe these assertions. There was then living in Rome an English-refugee, named Thomas Stukeley, an adventurer by nature, but possessing in a remarkable degree the art of gaining access to the great, and of winning their confidence. The pope had appointed him his chamberlain, had created him marquis of Leinster, and now expended forty thousand scudi to furnish him with ships and men. On the French coast Stukeley was to be joined by Fitzgerald, an Irish exile, commanding a small body of troops which he had got together, also at the pope's expense. Philip of Spain had no wish to engage in war, but he was glad to give Elizabeth occupation at home, and therefore contributed a sum of money towards this enterprise.² Stukeley, however, most unexpectedly allowed himself to be persuaded to take part in the expedition of King Sebastian of Portugal to Africa, with the force destined for Ireland, and he lost his life in that service. Fitzgerald was thus left to make the attempt alone; he landed in June, 1579, and at first gained some advantages, having seized the fort commanding the harbour of Limerick.

¹ Relatione del presente Stato d'Inghilterra, cavata da una lettera scritta di Londra, &c., Roma, 1590 (printed pamphlet), agrees entirely on this subject with a passage of Ribadaneira, De Schismate, which Hallam has already quoted (Constitutional History of England, i. p. 162); and is without doubt the original source: "Si permettevano giuramenti impii contra l'autorità della sede apostolica e questo con poco o nissun scrupolo di coscienza. Allora tutti andavano comunemente alle sinagoghe degli eretici et alle prediche loro menandovi li figli et famiglie: — si teneva allora per segno distintivo sufficiente venire alle chiese prima degli eretici e non partirsi in compagnia loro."

¹ Discorso sopra il Regno d'Irlanda e della gente che bisognaria per conquistarlo, fatto a Gregorio XIII, Library at Vienna, Fugger, MSS. The government of the queen is declared to be a tyranny: "Lasciando il governo a ministri Inglesi, i quali per arricchire se stessi usavano tutta l'arte della tirannide in quel regno, come trasportando le comodità del paese in Inghilterra, tassando il popolo contra le leggi a privilegi antichi, e mantenendo guerra e fattioni tra i paesani, — non volendo gli Inglesi che gli abitanti imparassero la differenza fra il viver libero e la servitù" [leaving the authority to English ministers, who practise every art of tyranny in that kingdom to enrich themselves; as, for example, transporting all the commodities of the country into England; taxing the people in violation of their ancient laws and privileges; and fomenting wars and factions among the natives of the country; the English not wishing that the inhabitants should learn the difference between living in freedom and in servitude.]

² Twenty thousand scudi, according to the nuncio Segá, in his Relatione compendiosa (MS. in the Berlin Library): "Altre mercedi fece fare al barone d'Acres, al Signor Carlo Buono et altri nobili Inglesi che si trovavano in Madrid, ch'egli spinsi andare a questa impresa insieme col vescovo Lionese d'Irlanda." [He also made grants to the Baron d'Acres, to Signor Carlo Buono, and other English noblemen then in Madrid, whom he urged to go on this expedition, together with Bishop Lionese of Ireland.]

The earl of Desmond was also in arms against the queen, and the whole island was thrown into commotion. But one misfortune soon followed another, the most serious being the death of Fitzgerald himself, who was killed in a skirmish. After this the earl of Desmond could no longer hold out, the supplies sent by the pope were insufficient, the money expected did not arrive, and the English remained victorious. They punished the insurgents with fearful cruelty : men and women were driven into barns and burnt to death, children were strangled, all Munster was laid waste, and English colonists took possession of the devastated province.

If Catholicism were ever again to raise its head in the dominions of Elizabeth, it was in England itself that the attempt must be made ; but this could manifestly not be done until the political relations of Europe should be altered. And if the pope desired to secure that the English Catholics should continue attached to the faith, if he wished to find them Catholic when the time for active exertion should arrive, it was indispensable that spiritual aid should be supplied to them.

William Allen first conceived the idea of collecting into one body the young English Catholics, who were sent to the continent for the prosecution of their studies, and, chiefly by the aid of Pope Gregory, he founded a college for them at Douay. But this did not seem sufficient to the pope ; he wished to provide a retreat for these young men beneath his own eye, and where they might be more secure and more tranquil than at Douay, in the turbulent Netherlands ; he therefore established an English college in Rome, endowed it with a rich abbey, and placed it, in the year 1579, under the care of the Jesuits.¹

No student was admitted into this college until he had first pledged himself to return to England on the completion of his studies, and there preach the faith of the Roman church. They were prepared for that purpose exclusively. Excited to religious enthusiasm by the spiritual exercises of Loyola, the missionaries sent by Pope Gregory the Great for the conversion of the Anglo-Saxons were placed before them as models for their imitation.

¹ The accounts of the Jesuits in Sacchinus, pars iv. lib. vi. 6 ; lib. vii. 10-30, may be here compared with Camden's statements, Rerum Britannicæ, tom. i. p. 315.

Some of the older students soon entered on this career. In the year 1580, two English Jesuits, Parsons and Campion, returned to their native country; constantly pursued, compelled to adopt feigned names, and to assume various disguises, they yet succeeded in reaching the capital, where they separated, the one travelling through the northern, the other through the southern counties. They usually took up their abode in the dwellings of the Catholic nobles. Their coming was always announced, but the precaution was constantly taken of receiving them as strangers. A chapel had meanwhile been prepared in the most retired part of the house, into which they were conducted, and where the members of the family were assembled to receive their benediction. The missionary rarely prolonged his stay beyond one night. The evening of his arrival was employed in religious preparation and confession; on the following morning, mass was said, the sacrament administered, and a sermon preached. All the Catholics who were in the neighbourhood attended, and the number was sometimes very great. The religion that for nine hundred years had ruled supreme over the island was thus once more inculcated, with the added charms of mystery and novelty. Secret synods were held, a printing-press was set up, first in a village near London, and afterwards in a lonely house in a neighbouring wood: Catholic books once more appeared, written with all the readiness and ability derived from constant practice in controversy, and sometimes with much elegance; the impression these works produced was strengthened by the impenetrable secrecy of their origin. The immediate result of these proceedings was, that the Catholics ceased to attend the Protestant service, and to observe the ecclesiastical edicts of the queen; and that the opposite party insisted on their opinions with increased violence, while persecution became more severe and oppressive.¹

This was the usual system of the Roman court and the

¹ See Campiani Vita et Martyrium; Ingoldstadii, 1584; also Sacchinus.

Jesuits. When Possevin retired from Sweden without having succeeded in his object, he made the proposal, which he also carried out, that in addition to the college at Braunsberg, a seminary should be established for young people from the northern countries, and especially Sweden, in order that they might afterwards influence their countrymen. He himself at once procured a large number of pupils. In the same way a seminary for young Livonians and Russians was founded at Wilna, and one for Hungarians at Clausenburg. The Roman court guaranteed fixed subventions, at least for fifteen years, and Gregory XIII said that no money was better spent than this.¹ We also find English seminaries soon afterwards in France and Spain. All such institutions were under the control of the metropolitan Collegium Romanum.

Wherever the principle of Catholic restoration had not strength enough to acquire the ascendancy, its effect was to exasperate both parties, and to render them more implacable.

An example of this was afforded by Switzerland, although each canton had long possessed the right of self-government in religious affairs, and the dissensions arising from time to time, in regard to the terms of the confederation, and the interpretation of the clauses concerning religion, in the "covenant of public peace" (Landfriedens), were very nearly set at rest.²

But the Jesuits found their way into that country also ; at the instance of a colonel in the Swiss guard of Rome, they presented themselves in Lucerne, in the year 1574, where they met with a cordial reception and zealous support, more

¹ Possevinus, Brunsbουργensis seminarii historia, in Theiner's "Schweden," ii. p. 322. He mentions how much had already been effected by the young people, who for one reason or another had gone back to their homes : "Magnum ubique catholice fidei ignem incendunt et in parentibus atque affinibus quaquaversum quae ferme sepultae catholice religionis semina jacebant excitaverunt."

² The most important was doubtless that relating to the fate of the evangelical party settled in Locarno, respecting which F. Meyer made a report in 1836, prepared from original documents. The Protestant cantons assented to that interpretation of the disputed article which favoured the Catholics, and allowed the evangelical party to be compelled to quit their country. They had completely disappeared from the canton in the year 1580.

especially from the family of Pfyffer.¹ Ludwig Pfyffer alone appeared to have expended thirty thousand gulden towards the erection of a Jesuits' college. Philip of Spain and the Guises are also said to have contributed money for that purpose, and the pope did not fail to display his unwearied generosity towards institutions of this character by furnishing the means for procuring a library. The people of Lucerne were greatly rejoiced at these things; they sent an express memorial to the General of the Order, entreating that he would not deprive them of those fathers of the society already in their city. "They were most anxious to see their youth brought up in sound learning, and above all in piety and a Christian life." They promised him, in return, to spare neither pains nor labour, neither life nor means, to serve the society in every thing they should desire.²

An opportunity was soon presented them of proving their renewed zeal for Catholicism in a matter of some consequence.

The city of Geneva had placed itself under the special protection of Berne, and now endeavoured to draw Solothurn and Freiburg into the same alliance. These towns had most commonly adhered to Berne in political affairs, though not in religious matters. With respect to Solothurn the attempt succeeded,—a Catholic city received the very centre of Western Protestantism into its protection. Gregory XIII was alarmed, and turned his best efforts to withhold at least Freiburg from the league. Lucerne then came to his assistance. An embassy from that canton joined its labours to those of the papal nuncio, and the people of Freiburg not only declined the proposed alliance, but even invited the Jesuits to their city, where, with the assistance of Gregory, they established a college.

The effects of Carlo Borromeo's exertions also began to make themselves apparent. His influence had extended particularly to the Wald cantons: Melchior Lussi, Landammann of Unterwalden, was esteemed the especial friend of the archbishop. Borromeo first sent Capuchins into the country, and these friars produced a great impression on the people of the mountain districts, by the rigour and simplicity of their lives; they were followed by the pupils of the Helvetic college, which the archbishop had founded for that express purpose.

¹ Agricola, 177.

² Literae Lucernensium ad Everardum Mercurianum in Sacchinus, Historia Societatis Jesu, iv. v. 145.

Traces of their influence were soon to be discovered in all public affairs. In the autumn of 1579, the Catholic cantons concluded a treaty with the bishop of Basle, in which they engaged, not only to protect him in religious matters, but also promised to bring back "to the true Catholic faith," if occasion should serve, whoever among his subjects had gone over to the Protestant opinions. This engagement was evidently calculated to arouse the evangelical inhabitants of the cantons, and accordingly dissensions became more decided and bitter than they had been for a long time. A papal nuncio arrived, who was received in the Catholic cantons with every possible mark of reverence, while in those of the Protestants he was contemned and insulted,

8. CRISIS IN THE NETHERLANDS

The general state of things in Europe was at that time as we are about to describe. Restored Catholicism, under the form it had assumed in Italy and Spain, had made an extensive inroad upon the rest of Europe. It had gained important conquests in Germany, and had made considerable advances in other countries, but in all it had encountered determined opposition. In France the Protestants were secured by extensive privileges and by the strength of their position—military and political. In the Netherlands they held the supremacy. They were triumphant in England, Scotland, and the North. In Poland they had extorted stringent laws in their own favour, and had gained extensive influence in the general affairs of the kingdom. Throughout the territories of Austria they confronted the government, armed with the ancient immunities of the provincial states.

In Lower Germany the ecclesiastical institution seemed to be on the point of suffering material change.

In this position of affairs, vast importance was attached to the issue of the struggle in the Netherlands, where the people were continually resorting to arms.

It was impossible that Philip II could intend to repeat those measures which had already suffered so signal a failure; he was not, indeed, in a condition to do so. It was his good fortune to receive the assistance of friends who presented themselves spontaneously. Protestantism, also, was arrested in its progress by an obstacle at once unexpected and insurmountable. We shall be well repaid for devoting a short time to the consideration of this important event.

In the first place, it was by no means agreeable to all parties in the provinces, that the prince of Orange should possess so large an extent of power,—least of all was this satisfactory to the Walloon nobility.

Under the government of the king, these nobles had ever been the first to take horse in all wars, most especially in those with France; it thus happened that the leaders of note, whom the people were accustomed to follow, had acquired a certain independence and authority. Under the government of the States, the nobles found themselves, on the contrary, placed in the background; their pay was irregular; the army of the States consisted principally of Dutch, English, and Germans, who, being undoubted Protestants, enjoyed the largest share of confidence.

When the Walloons acceded to the treaty of Ghent, they had hoped to obtain a leading influence in the general affairs of the country, but the result was altogether contrary—power fell almost exclusively into the hands of the prince of Orange and his friends in Holland and Zealand.

But the personal disaffection thus occasioned was not all,—religious animosities combined with it.

Whatever may have been the cause, the fact is certain, that in the Walloon provinces but little sympathy was ever excited towards the Protestant movements.

In these districts the new bishops, almost all men of great practical ability, had been peaceably installed. The see of Arras was held by François de Richardot, who had eagerly imbibed the principles of Catholic restoration in the council of Trent, and was the subject of incessant praises, for the elegance and learning that he united with force and solidity in his preaching, as well as for the zeal, tempered by acquaintance with the world, evinced in his life.¹ The bishop of Namur was Antoine Havet, a Dominican, endowed, perhaps, with less worldly prudence, but also a member of the council, and equally zealous for the promulgation of its edicts and the enforcement of their spirit.² The see of St. Omer was occupied by Gerard de Hamericourt, one of the richest prelates in all the provinces, who was also abbot of St. Bertin. His ambition was to promote the education of the youth in his diocese: he founded many schools, and was the first who founded a college for the Jesuits in the Netherlands, supported by fixed revenues. Under these and other heads of the Church, Artois, Hainault, and Namur remained in peace, while all the other provinces were exposed to the wild turbulence of the iconoclastic riots,³ and in consequence, these districts had not been so heavily visited by the reaction under Alva.⁴ The decrees of the council of Trent were discussed with but short delay in the provincial councils and diocesan synods, and their provisions were at once enforced. The influence of the Jesuits extended rapidly from St. Omer, and still more effectually from Douay. Philip II had established a university at Douay in order that such of his subjects as spoke the French language might have opportunity for study without leaving their country. This was in furtherance of that strict ecclesiastical constitution which it was the purpose of Philip to introduce throughout his dominions. Not far from Douay stood the Benedictine

¹ Gazet, Histoire Ecclésiastique des Pays-Bas, p. 143, describes him as "subtile et solide en doctrine, nerveux en raisons, riche en sentences, copieux en discours, poly en son langage et grave en actions; mais surtout l'excellente piété et vertu, qui reluisoit en sa vie, rendoit son oraison persuasive."

² Havensius, De Ereptione Novorum Episcopatum in Belgio, p. 50.

³ Hopper, Recueil et Mémorial des Troubles des Pays-Bas, 93, 98.

⁴ According to Viglii Commentarius Rerum actarum super impositione decimi denarii, in Papenbrecht, Analecta, i. i. 292, the tenth penny was imposed on them with the assurance that it should not be rigidly exacted.

abbey of Anchin. At the time when the fury of the iconoclasts was raging in almost every other part of the Netherlands, the abbot, Jean Lentaille, was there engaged with his monks in the practice of the spiritual exercises of Ignatius Loyola: inflamed by the enthusiasm excited by these exercises, he determined to institute a college of Jesuits in the new university, and endow it from the revenues of his abbey. It was opened accordingly in the year 1568, immediately obtained a certain independence of the university authorities, and rapidly acquired unusual prosperity. Eight years afterwards, the flourishing state of this university, even as regarded literary study, was principally attributed to the Jesuits. Not only was their college filled with pious and diligent young men, but the other colleges also had greatly profited by the emulation it excited. Already the whole university was supplied with theologians from this college, and the provinces of Artois and Hainault received numerous priests from the same source.¹ It gradually became the central point of modern Catholicism for all the surrounding country. In the year 1578, the Walloon provinces were considered among their contemporaries to be, according to their own expression, in the highest degree Catholic.²

But this religious organization was endangered no less than the political claims of the provinces by the increasing predominance of Lutheran opinions.

At Ghent the form assumed by Protestantism was such as in the present day we should call revolutionary. There the ancient liberties, which had been crushed by Charles V in 1539, had never been forgotten. The atrocities of Alva had excited peculiar exasperation in that city. The populace was fierce and ungovernable, much inclined to image-breaking, and violently enraged against the priests. Two daring leaders of the people, Imbize and Ryhove, availed themselves of these tumultuary feelings. Imbize conceived the idea of establishing a republic, and fancied that Ghent would become a new Rome. They commenced their proceedings at the moment when their governor, Aerschot, was holding a meeting with certain bishops and Catholic leaders of the neighbouring towns, whom they took prisoners, together with himself. They next restored the ancient constitution, with modifications, as will be readily supposed, which secured to themselves the possession of power. They laid hands on the property of the Church, abolished the bishopric, and confiscated the abbeys. The hospitals and monasteries they converted into barracks, and finally they endeavoured to introduce a similar order of things among their neighbours by force of arms.¹

¹ Testimonium Thomae Stapletoni (rector of the university) of the year 1576, in Sacchinus, iv. iv. 124: "Plurimos ex hoc patrum collegio (the collegium Aquicintense) Artesia et Hannonia pastores, multos schola nostra theologos optime institutos et comparatos accepit." Still higher eulogies follow, but may be omitted, and the rather as Stapleton was himself a Jesuit.

² Michiel, Relatione di Francia: "Il conte (the governor of Hennegau) è cattolichissimo, come è tutto quel contado insieme con quel d'Artoes che li è propinquo."

Now it happened that some of the leaders taken prisoners with the governor belonged to the Walloon provinces, where the troops of Ghent were already making incursions. All who were disposed to the Protestant opinions began to arouse themselves, and the democratic passions of the people were called in aid of the religious excitement, as had been done in Ghent. In Arras a tumult was raised against the senate. Even from Douay the Jesuits were expelled in a commotion of the people, in spite of the efforts made by the council; and although they were not compelled to absent themselves more than fourteen days, the circumstance was one of great importance. In St. Omer they maintained their ground only by the special protection of the council.

The civic magistracy, the provincial nobility, and the clergy, were all at the same time endangered and oppressed. They saw themselves menaced by a revolution equally destructive with that which had just occurred in Ghent; it is therefore not surprising if in this peril they should have recourse to every possible means of defence. They first sent their troops into the territory of Ghent, which they cruelly devastated, and then looked around for some alliance from which they might derive a more certain security than was afforded by their connection with the general union of the Netherlands.

¹ Van der Vynkt's Geschichte der Niederlande, Bd. ii. Buch v. Abschnitt 2. This section is perhaps the most important part of the whole work.

Don John of Austria was not backward in turning this disposition of mind to his own purposes.

If we consider the conduct and measures of Don John in the Netherlands from a general point of view only, we are almost inclined to think that they produced no results; that his existence passed away without leaving a trace, as it had done without satisfaction to himself. But if we examine more closely what his position was, what his actions were, and what consequences resulted from his measures, we shall find that to him above all other persons must be attributed the foundation of the Spanish Netherlands. Don John endeavoured for some time to abide by the terms of the treaty of Ghent, but the independent position assumed by the states, with that held by the prince of Orange, who was much more powerful than himself,—the viceroy,—and the suspicions entertained by each party against the other, made an open rupture inevitable; he therefore resolved to begin the war. This was doubtless in opposition to the will of his brother, but it was unavoidable. There were no other means by which he could hope to secure a single province to the sovereignty of Spain; but by adopting this method he succeeded. He retained possession of Luxembourg, he invested Namur, and the battle of Gemblours made him master of Louvain and Limburg. If the king desired to recover his power in the Netherlands, that was not to be effected by treating with the States-general, which was manifestly impracticable; it could only be done by a gradual subjugation of the separate districts; either by terms of convention or force of arms. This system Don John adopted, and it soon laid open to him the most cheering prospects. He succeeded in reviving the old attachment of the Walloon provinces to the Burgundian race, and had the good fortune to gain over to his party two men of great power and influence, Pardieu de la Motte, governor of Gravelines, and Matthieu Moulart, bishop of Arras.¹

¹ That they were gained over during the life of Don John appears from the two passages following; 1. Strada, ii. i. p. 19: "Pardieus

These were the men who, after the early death of Don John, conducted the negotiations, on which every thing depended, with great zeal and success.

De la Motte availed himself of the increasing hatred against the Protestants. He effected the removal of many garrisons belonging to the states from the fortresses they occupied, solely on the ground that they might be Protestant, and contrived that a decree should be issued, in the month of November, by the nobles of Artois, excluding all who professed the reformed opinions from that province; which decree was at once carried into execution. After this commencement, Matthieu Moulart endeavoured to bring about a complete reconciliation with Philip. He began by imploring the assistance of God in a solemn procession, which he conducted through the whole city; and it was, in fact, a very difficult enterprise that he had undertaken; for among other things, he had occasionally to bring about a coalition between men whose claims were directly opposed to each other. He proved himself to be shrewd, conciliating, and indefatigable, and his endeavours were entirely successful.

Alexander Farnese, the successor of Don John, possessed the inestimable gift of persuading, attaching, and inspiring lasting confidence. He was assisted by François de Richardot, nephew to the bishop; "a man," says Cabrera, "of keen penetration and sound judgment in various affairs, and experienced in all; he was capable of conducting every sort of business, be its nature what it might." Sarrazin, abbot of St. Vaast, was also his zealous supporter; of him the same Cabrera says, "He was a great politician, with an appearance of tranquil indifference; very ambitious under a shew of extreme humility, and was skilled to maintain himself in the good opinion of all."¹

We do not follow the whole course of the negotiations till they gradually attained their end.

Mottae dominus non rediturum modo se ad regis obedientiam, sed etiam quamplures secum tracturum, iam pridem significarat Ioanni Austriaco." 2. Tassis: "Episcopum Atrebatensem, qui vivente adhuc Austriaco se regi conciliarat."

¹ Cabrera, Felipe Segundo, p. 1021.

It must suffice to say, that on the part of the provinces the interests of self-preservation and of religion pointed to the king; while on the part of Philip II nothing was omitted that priestly influence and dexterous negotiation, combined with the returning favour of the sovereign, could effect. In April, 1579, Emanuel de Montigny—whom the Walloon forces acknowledged as their leader—entered the service of the king. He was followed by Count de Lalaing, without whom Hainault could never have been won. At length, on the 17th of May, 1579, the treaty was concluded in the camp of Maestricht. But to what conditions was the king compelled to submit! It was a restoration of his authority, but was effected only under the strictest limitations. He not only promised to dismiss all foreigners from his army, and to employ troops raised in the Netherlands alone, but he agreed to confirm all those in their places who had acquired office during the troubles. The inhabitants even pledged themselves to receive no garrison of which information had not previously been given to the estates of the country; two-thirds of the council of state were to consist of men who had been implicated in the disturbances. The remaining articles were all in a similar spirit.¹ The provinces acquired a degree of independence, exceeding any thing that they had ever before possessed.

This event involved a turn of affairs that was of universal importance. Throughout the west of Europe, all attempts hitherto made for the maintenance or restoration of Catholicism had been by open force; and, under this pretext, the sovereign power had laboured to complete the destruction of all provincial freedom. But monarchy was now compelled to adopt a different course. If kings desired to reinstate Catholicism, and to uphold their own authority, they must take their measures in firm alliance with constitutional assemblies, and in coalition with public immunities.

We have seen that the royal power was closely restricted; but, in spite of all the limits imposed, it had yet obtained important advantages. The provinces on which the might of the house of Burgundy had been founded had returned to their allegiance. Alexander Farnese continued the war with the Walloon troops; and, though making slow progress, he still advanced. In 1580, he gained possession of Courtray; in 1581, of Tournay; and in 1582 he took Oudenarde.

¹ Tassis gives this treaty at full length, lib. v. 394-405.

But these events did not bring affairs to a complete decision. The union of the Catholic provinces with the king was perhaps the very cause which compelled the northern districts, all exclusively Protestant, not only to form a closer confederation among themselves, but eventually to declare an absolute renunciation of the royal authority.

We will here take a rapid glance at the general history of the Netherlands. A contest of long standing subsisted in all the provinces between the provincial rights and the sovereign prerogative. In the time of Alva, princely power had obtained a preponderance more decided than it had ever before possessed, but which it could not even then long maintain. The treaty of Ghent demonstrated the complete superiority acquired by the popular bodies over the government. The northern provinces possessed no advantages over those of the south in this respect; had they been of one opinion in religion, they would have constituted one general republic of the Netherlands; but they were separated, as we have seen, by a difference of faith. From this circumstance, it followed, first, that the Catholics returned to the protection of the king, with whom they pledged themselves, above all, to the maintenance of the Catholic religion; and a second result was, that the Protestants, after long persevering in the struggle, at length cast aside the very name of subjection, and entirely renounced their allegiance to the king. We give the name of the subject provinces to the first of these parties, and designate the last as the republic; but we must not suppose the essential difference between them to have been so great as these names would imply; for the subjected provinces asserted all their rights and the privileges of their estates with the most spirited tenacity, while the republican provinces could not dispense with an institution (the stadtholdership) which was closely analogous to that of royalty. The most important distinction consisted in their religion.

It was by this that the true principles of the contest were brought out, and that events were matured and advanced to their consummation.

Philip II had just at this period completed the conquest of Portugal; and at the moment when he was stimulated by the achievement of this great success to the undertaking of new enterprises, the Walloon states at length agreed to the return of the Spanish troops.

Count de Lalaing was gained over to the Spanish side, and with him his wife, who had been an active opponent of the Spaniards, and to whom their expulsion was principally ascribed. The whole body of the Walloon nobility followed their example. Men persuaded themselves that a renewal of Alva's despotism and violence was no more to be dreaded. The Spanish-Italian army, already withdrawn once, then brought back, and again expelled, returned once more to the country. With the troops of the Netherlands alone, the war must have been indefinitely protracted; the superior force and discipline of the Spanish veterans brought the conflict to a crisis.

As in Germany, the colonies of Jesuits, composed of Spaniards, Italians, and some few Netherlanders, had restored Catholicism by the zealous inculcation of its dogmas, and by carefully-arranged education; so now in the Netherlands, a Spanish-Italian army appeared, to unite with the Walloon Catholics for the reinstatement of the Roman supremacy by force of arms.

At this point of the history we are treating, it is impossible to avoid some slight description of the war; in its course the destinies of religion were also involved.

In July, 1583, the port and town of Dunkirk were taken in six days. They were followed by Nieuport and the whole coast, even to Ostend, Dixmuiden, and Furnes.

The character of the war was at once made manifest. In every thing relating to politics, the Spaniards displayed forbearance; but in all that pertained to religion, they were inexorable. It was not to be thought of that the Protestants should be allowed a church; they were refused even the right of private worship; all the preachers taken were instantly hanged. The war was conducted with full consciousness and fixed design, as a war of religion; and, in a certain sense, this was indeed the most prudent system, the existing state of things considered. A complete subjugation of the Protestants could never have been effected but by so decided a mode of proceeding: whatever elements of Catholicism the provinces contained, were aroused to activity, and excited to aid the Spanish cause; and, accordingly, their co-operation was offered spontaneously. The Bailliu Servaes of Seeland delivered the district of Waes to the royalists. Hulst and Axel surrendered; and Alexander Farnese soon found himself sufficiently powerful to prepare for attack on the more important cities. He was already master of the country and the coast; the cities soon followed. In the month of April, Ypres surrendered, immediately afterwards Bruges, and finally, Ghent, where Imbize himself took part with the reconciliation party. The conditions granted to the communes, in their political character, were very favourable. Their immunities were for the most part respected, but the Protestants were expelled without mercy. The principal condition in every case was, that the Catholic clergy should be reinstated, and the churches restored to the Catholic worship.

But with all that had been effected, nothing permanent seemed to be gained, no security was possessed while the prince of Orange survived: his existence gave force and consistency to the opposition, and prevented hope from expiring even in the vanquished.

The Spaniards had set a price of twenty-five thousand scudi on his head, and amidst the fierce excitement of the period there could not fail to be men whose fanaticism and avarice would prompt them to earn this reward. I do not know that the annals of humanity can furnish a more fearful blasphemy than that found in the papers of the Biscayan Jaureguy, who was taken in attempting the life of the prince. He carried about him, as a kind of amulet, prayers in which he besought the merciful Godhead, who appeared to men in the person of Christ, to aid in the completion of the murder, and in which he promised a portion of the reward to the divine persons in the event of his enterprise being accomplished. To the Virgin at Bayonne he would give a robe, a lamp, and a crown; to the Virgin at Aranzosu, a crown; and to the Lord Jesus himself, a rich curtain!¹ This fanatic was fortunately seized, but another was already preparing to imitate him. At the moment when the ban was proclaimed against the prince in Maestricht, a Burgundian, named Balthasar Gerard, felt himself inspired by the wish to carry it into execution. The hopes he entertained of earthly happiness and glory if he succeeded, or of the fame of a martyr in the event of failure, were confirmed by a Jesuit of Trier, and thoughts of these things would not suffer him to rest day or night until he set about the accomplishment of the crime. He represented himself to the prince as a refugee, and having thus gained admittance, he found a favourable opportunity in July, 1584, and killed the prince at one shot. He was taken, but all the tortures inflicted on him failed to extort a sigh from his lips; he persisted in declaring that if the deed were not done he would yet do it. Whilst Gerard was expiring at Delft, amidst the execrations of the people, the canons of Herzogenbusch performed a solemn Te Deum in celebration of his act.²

¹ Contemporary copy of a vow and of certain prayers, found in the form of an amulet upon Jaueguy: in the Collection of Lord Francis Egerton. "A vos, Señor Jesus Christo, redemptor y salvador del mundo, criador del cielo y de la tierra, os ofrezco, siendo os servido librarne con vida despues de haver effectuado mi deseo, un belo muy rico." And so it proceeds.

² Relatione del successo della morte di Giulielmo di Nassau, principe di Orange e delli tormenti patiti del generosissimo giovane Baldassare Gerardi Borgognone: Inff. Polit. xii., contains circumstances differing from the usual accounts: "Gerardi, la cui madre è di Bisansone, d'anni 28 incirca, giovane non meno dotto che eloquente." [Gerard, whose mother is from Besançon, was about twenty-eight years old, and was a youth of no less learning than eloquence;]—he had entertained this design for six years and a half: "Offerendosi dunque l'opportunità di portar le lettere del duca d'Alansone al Nassau, essendo già lui gentilhuomo di casa, alli 7 Luglio un' hora e mezzo dopo pranzo, uscendo il principe della tavola, scargandoli un archibugetto con tre palle gli colse sotto la zinna manca e gli fece una ferita di due diti, colla quale l'ammazzò." [The opportunity then occurring of taking letters to Nassau from the duke of Alençon (to whom he was gentleman of the household) on the 7th of July, an hour and a half after dinner, and the prince just rising from table, he fired an arquebuss loaded with three balls, struck him under the left breast, and made a wound two inches broad, by which he killed him.]

The passions of both parties were in fierce commotion, but the impulse communicated to the Catholics was the stronger,—it accomplished its purpose and bore off the victory.

Had the prince lived, he would doubtless have found means, as he had promised, to relieve Antwerp, which was already besieged ; but no one could now be found to occupy his place.

The measures adopted for the reduction of Antwerp were so comprehensive in their character that all other towns in Brabant were directly menaced by them. The prince of Parma cut off supplies of provisions from all ; Brussels was the first to surrender : that city, accustomed to abundance, was no sooner threatened by want, than discords arose, and soon led to its being surrendered ; next fell Mechlin, and at length, on the failure of a last attempt to cut through the dams and procure the means of existence by land, Antwerp also was compelled to yield.

The conditions imposed on the cities of Brabant, as on those of Flanders, were particularly mild ; Brussels was exempted from the payment of contributions ; Antwerp received a promise that no Spanish garrison should be placed in the city, and that the citadel should not be repaired. One condition was indeed permitted to take the place of all others, the restoration, namely, of all churches and chapels, with the reinstatement of all the exiled clergy, secular and monastic ;—on this the king insisted with inflexible firmness ; he declared that it must be the first and last stipulation of every agreement ; the only favour he could be persuaded to grant was that the inhabitants of all towns should be allowed two years either to change their religion, or to sell their possessions and quit the Spanish dominions.

How completely had the times changed their aspect ! At one period Philip himself had hesitated to grant the Jesuits a fixed establishment in the Netherlands, and they had often since those days been menaced, attacked, and expelled. The events of this war led to their immediate return, and that under the decided protection of the government. The Farnesi, moreover, were especial patrons of the order. Alexander had a Jesuit for his confessor, and beheld in the society the most efficient instrument for restoring the half Protestant country he had conquered to the Catholic church, and thus completing the principal purpose of the war.¹ The first city they re-entered was Courtray, the first that had been taken. The parish priest of the town, Jean David, had become acquainted with the Jesuits during his exile at Douay; he now returned to Courtray, but his first step was to join the Order. In his farewell sermon to his parishioners, he exhorted them no longer to deprive themselves of the spiritual aid to be derived from that society, and they were readily persuaded into following his advice; instantly afterwards the aged John Montagna, who had first established the Jesuits in Tournay, whence he had more than once been compelled to fly, returned to fix their company in that town, where they acquired a permanent residence. On the surrender of Ypres and Bruges, the Jesuits entered those cities also, and the king willingly bestowed on them certain convents which had been deserted during the troubles. In Ghent, the house of the great demagogue Imbize, whence had originated so much mischief to Catholicism, was fitted up for their reception. When the people of Antwerp surrendered, they tried to obtain a promise that those monastic orders only which had existed in the time of Charles V should be reinstated; but this was not conceded to them,—they were compelled to admit the Jesuits again, and to restore the buildings before possessed by the order. One of the Jesuit historians relates these facts with infinite complacency, and points it out as a special mark of the divine approval, that the society received back property unencumbered, which they had left loaded with debt; it had passed in the meantime through many different hands, but was nevertheless restored to them without hesitation or inquiry. Brussels did not escape the general destiny; the town-council declared its assent to their establishment, the prince of Parma assigned them a pension from the royal treasure, and in that city also the Jesuits assumed an advantageous position. The prince had already solemnly conferred on them the right to hold real property under ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and freely to avail themselves in those provinces of the privileges they held from the Apostolic see.

¹ Sacchinus: Alexandro et privati ejus consilii viris ea stabat sententia, ut quaeque recipiebatur ex haereticis civitas, continuo fere in eam immitti societatem debere: valere id tum ad pietatem privatam civium tum ad pacem tranquillitatemque intelligebant. (Pars v. lib. iv. n. 58.) According to the Imago Primi Seculi, this was also the will of the king, “qui recens datis de hoc argumento literis ducem cum cura monuerat ut societatis praesidio munire satageret praecipuas quasque Belgii civitates.” Assertions sufficiently borne out by the facts.

Nor was the patronage of the prince confined to the order of Jesuits; in the year 1585, a small number of Capuchins arrived in the Netherlands, and on addressing a special letter to the pope, the prince obtained permission for their fixed residence in that country. He then bought them a house in Antwerp; they produced a powerful effect even on the different religious communities, insomuch that the pope found it needful to restrain the other Franciscans from adopting the reformed rule of the Capuchins.

The most important consequences gradually resulted from all these arrangements. They transformed Belgium, which had previously been half Protestant, into one of the most decidedly Catholic countries in the world. It is also unquestionable that they contributed, at least in the commencement, to the re-establishment of the royal authority.

As one of the results of these changes, the opinion that only one religion ought to be tolerated in a state became more and more firmly established. This is one of the principal maxims in the political system of Justus Lipsius. In affairs of religion, he declares, neither favour nor indulgence is permissible; the true mercy is to be merciless; to save many, we must not scruple to remove one here and there out of the way.

This is a principle that was received in no country with a more cordial acceptance than in Germany.

9. PROGRESS OF THE COUNTER-REFORMATION IN GERMANY

The Netherlands being still a circle of the German empire, it followed of necessity that the events occurring in the former country would be extremely influential on the affairs of Germany. The disputes in Cologne were brought to a decision as one of the first and most immediate consequences of the change in the Netherlands.

The Spaniards had not yet returned, still less had the Catholics achieved their great triumphs, when the Elector Truchsess of Cologne determined to adopt the reformed religion, and to marry, without, on that account, resigning his archbishopric. This occurred in November, 1582. He had the greater part of the nobility on his side; the counts of Nuenar, Solms, Wittgenstein, Wied, and Nassau, with the whole duchy of Westphalia, all professing the evangelical opinions. With the Bible in one hand and the sword in the other, the elector entered Bonn, while Casimir of the Palatinate took the field in considerable force to reduce the city of Cologne, the chapter, and the remaining officers of the archbishopric who were opposed to the Elector Truchsess.

In all the transactions of those times, we find this Casimir of the Palatinate always ready to mount his horse or draw his sword, and always followed by martial bands, disposed to Protestantism, but he rarely seemed to effect any thing important. He did not carry on the war with the earnest purpose demanded by a contest for religion, because he had always some interest of his own before his eyes; nor did he display the science and energy distinguishing those who appeared against him. In the case we are considering, he did indeed lay waste the plain country of his opponents, but he accomplished nothing in promotion of the general interests;¹ he achieved no conquests, nor did he succeed in obtaining more efficient assistance among the Protestant powers of Germany.

¹ Isselt, Historia Belli Coloniensis, p. 1092: "Tota hac aestate nihil hoc exercitu dignum egit."

The Catholic powers, on the contrary, gathered all their forces together. Pope Gregory would not permit the business to be subjected to the delays remarked in every proceeding of the Curia; he considered that the urgency of the case made a simple consistory of the cardinals sufficient to decide an affair of so much importance as the despoiling an elector of the empire of his archiepiscopal dignity.¹ His nuncio, Malaspina, had already hurried to Cologne, where, with the special aid of the learned members of the chapter, he not only succeeded in excluding all the less firmly Catholic members from that body, but also in raising to the archiepiscopal throne a prince of the only house still remaining thoroughly Catholic, Duke Ernest of Bavaria, bishop of Freisingen.² Thereupon a German Catholic army appeared in the field, which the duke of Bavaria had collected, with the aid of subsidies from the pope. The emperor lost no time in threatening the Count Palatine Casimir with ban and double ban (Acht und Aberacht); he sent besides admonitory letters to the troops of Casimir, which eventually caused the army of the Palatinate to disperse. When affairs had reached this point, the Spaniards also appeared. They had taken Zutphen in the summer of 1583; they now marched three thousand five hundred Belgian veterans into the archbishopric. To enemies so numerous, Gebhard Truchsess was compelled to yield; his troops would not act in opposition to the imperial mandate; his principal fortress surrendered to the united Spanish and Bavarian forces, and he was himself obliged to seek refuge with the prince of Orange, at whose side he had hoped to stand forward as a defender of Protestantism.

It will be readily perceived that this event must have contributed largely towards the complete re-establishment of Catholicism in the country. From the first outbreak of the disturbances, the clergy of the diocese had suspended all disputes existing among themselves; the nuncio removed all suspected members, and a Jesuit college was established amidst the very tumult of arms, so that when victory was gained, nothing more was required than to continue the course already entered on. The Catholic clergy had been driven from Westphalia by Gebhard Truchsess,—they now returned with other fugitives, and were held in great honour.¹ The Protestant canons continued in exclusion from their prebends, and, contrary to all precedent, they no longer received their revenues. It is true that the papal nuncios were compelled to proceed with great caution and gentleness, even as regarded Catholics, a fact of which Pope Sixtus was well aware, and he commanded the legate by no means to press forward the reforms he might find needful, until he should be certain that all were disposed to receive them. But it was by this discreet mode of approach that the nuncio imperceptibly reached his end. The canons, however illustrious their birth, at length began again to perform their clerical duties in the cathedral. The council of Cologne, which was opposed by a Protestant party in the city, supported the Catholic opinions with their utmost power.

¹ Maffei, Annali di Gregorio XIII, ii. xii. 8.

² Letter from Malaspina to Duke William of Bavaria, in Adlzreitter, ii. xii. 295: "Quod cupiebamus," he here remarks, "impetravimus."

The effects of this great revolution could not fail to be felt in all the remaining ecclesiastical states, and they were further heightened in the neighbourhood of Cologne by a particular accident. Henry of Saxe-Lauenburg, bishop of Paderborn and Osnabrück, archbishop of Bremen, left his palace of Vöhrde one Sunday in April, 1585, and proceeded to church; on the way back his horse fell with him, and although still young, in perfect health, and receiving, as it appeared, no serious injury from the fall, he yet died in consequence before the end of the month. It was believed that this prince would have followed the example of Gebhard Truchsess, had the latter been more fortunate. The elections that followed his death were greatly to the advantage of Catholicism. The new bishop of Osnabrück did not refuse to subscribe the professio fidei,² and the new bishop of Paderborn, Theodor von Fürstenberg, was a most bigoted Catholic; even as canon he had opposed his predecessor, and so early as the year 1580, he effected the passing of a statute, providing that Catholics only should for the future be received into the chapter.¹ He had also procured the admittance of a few Jesuits, whom he had suffered to preach in the cathedral, and to whom he had confided the upper classes of the gymnasium; the latter with the condition that they should not wear the dress of their order. How much more easily could he now promote the views of his party, being himself in possession of the bishopric. The Jesuits no longer found it needful to conceal their presence, the gymnasium was made over to them without reserve, and they were not only permitted to preach but to catechize. They found abundant occupation. The town-council was entirely Protestant, and there were very few Catholics among the burghers; in the country around, things were much the same. The Jesuits compared Paderborn to a barren field, demanding infinite labour and yielding no return. We shall, nevertheless, have occasion to shew hereafter, that in the beginning of the seventeenth century their industry had penetrated this stubborn soil.

¹ "The elector Ernest," says Khevenhiller, "has re-established both the Catholic religion and the temporal government in harmony with ancient usages."

² According to Strunck, Annales Paderbornenses, p. 514, Bernhard von Waldeck had in earlier times been disposed to Protestantism: during the troubles in Cologne, he had remained neutral, and now he

In Münster also the death of Henry of Saxe-Lauenburg occasioned important changes. No election had hitherto been made in the see, where the younger members supported Prince Henry, while the elder opposed him; but Duke Ernest of Bavaria, elector of Cologne and bishop of Liège, was now chosen bishop of Münster also. This election was secured principally by the influence of Dean Raesfeld, the most zealous Catholic in the diocese, who further bequeathed twelve thousand rix-dollars from his own revenues for the establishment of a Jesuits' college in Münster, and died adopted the Catholic confession. Chytræus (Saxonia, 812) does not contradict this.

¹ Bessen, Geschichte von Paderborn, ii. 123. In Reiffenberg, Historia Provinciae ad Rhenum Inferiorem, lib. viii. c. i. p. 185, may be found a letter from Pope Gregory XIII: "dilectis filiis canonicis et capitulo ecclesiae Paderbornensis," 6th Feb. 1584, wherein he praises this spirit of opposition: "It is right that it should be thus: the more violently you are attacked, the more vigorous must be your resistance; the pope himself bears the fathers of the Society of Jesus in his heart."

soon after making his will. The first members of the order arrived in 1587. They met with determined opposition from the canons, the preachers, and the citizens; but were supported by the council and the prince: their schools soon gave proof of their extraordinary merit as instructors; and in the third year of their labours they are said to have counted a thousand scholars. In the same year, 1590, they acquired complete independence from a voluntary grant of Church property conferred on them by the prince.¹

The Elector Ernest also held the bishopric of Hildesheim. It is true that his power was much more closely restricted in that diocese; he was, nevertheless, able to promote the introduction of the Jesuits; the first who entered Hildesheim was John Hammer, a native of the town, and brought up in the Lutheran faith (his father was still living), but actuated by all the zeal of a new convert. His preaching was remarkable for clearness and force; he effected several brilliant conversions, and eventually made good his position. In the year 1590, the Jesuits obtained a residence and pension in Hildesheim.

We cannot fail to observe that the attachment of the house of Bavaria to the Catholic faith was of the first importance, even as regarded Lower Germany, where in so many dioceses at once, a Bavarian prince appears as its most earnest defender.

We are, nevertheless, not to imagine that this prince was very zealous or very devout in his personal conduct. He had natural children; and it was at one time believed that he would end by adopting a similar course to that taken by Gebhard Truchsess. The caution with which Pope Sixtus treated the Elector Ernest is sufficiently remarkable. He carefully abstained from shewing the prince that his irregularities were known to him, perfectly as he was acquainted with them; for otherwise admonitions and exhortations would have been necessary, and these might have driven the self-willed Ernest to resolutions by no means desirable.²

It was, indeed, long before affairs in Germany could be treated as those of the Netherlands had been ; they required the most delicate regard to various personal feelings and interests.

¹ Sacchinus, pars v. lib. viii. n. 83-91. Reiffenberg, Historia Provinciae ad Rhenum Inferiorem, i. ix. vi.

² Tempesti, Vita di Sisto V., tom. i. p. 354.

Duke William of Cleves conformed in externals to the Catholic confession, but his policy was altogether Protestant. He readily accorded protection and shelter to the Protestant exiles, and excluded his son, John William, who was a zealous Catholic, from all participation in public affairs. The court of Rome might easily have been tempted to display resentment and disapprobation of these proceedings, and to favour the opposition of John William to his father ; but Sixtus V was much too prudent to suffer this. He would not even allow the nuncio to hold a conference with the prince, until the latter pressed so earnestly for the interview, that it could no longer be avoided without offence. The meeting then took place at Düsseldorf, but the prince was, above all things, exhorted to patience. Sixtus would not permit John William to be invested with the order of the Golden Fleece, for that might awaken suspicion. He further refrained from interceding directly with the father in favour of the son ; any connection of the latter with Rome might occasion displeasure ; he ventured only so far as to procure the mediation of the emperor, and thus endeavoured to obtain for the prince a position more suitable to his birth. He directed his nuncio to act with regard to certain things as though he did not perceive them ; and this considerate forbearance on the part of an authority that had not ceased to be acknowledged, produced its natural effect : the nuncio gradually obtained influence ; and when the Protestants applied to the diet for certain concessions, it was principally in consequence of his representations that they were not granted.¹

Thus, throughout a great part of Lower Germany, Catholicism, if not immediately restored, was yet maintained in the hour of danger : confirmed and strengthened, it acquired a degree of preponderance, that, in the course of time, might be matured into absolute supremacy.

In Upper Germany, a similar train of circumstances immediately ensued.

¹ Tempesti, Vita di Sisto V, tom. i. p. 359.

•We have alluded to the position of the Franconian bishoprics. A bishop of determined character might easily have conceived the idea of availing himself of this state of things for the attainment of hereditary sovereignty.

It was, probably, some consideration of this kind by which Julius Echter of Mespelbronn was led to hesitate for some time as to the line of policy he should pursue, when, in the year 1573, while still very young, and naturally enterprising, he was elected bishop of Würzburg.

He took an active part in the expulsion of the abbot of Fulda ; and it could not have been any very decided disposition to Catholicism that brought the chapter and states of Fulda into connection with Julius, since it was the determination of their abbot to restore Catholicism that formed their principal complaint against him ; and the bishop had a misunderstanding with Rome in consequence of that affair. Gregory XIII imposed his commands on him to restore Fulda, at the time when Gebhard Truchsess proclaimed his revolt. In effect, Julius prepared to make an application to the elector of Saxony, and to call on the head of the Lutherans for aid against the pope. He was in the most intimate connection with Truchsess ; and the latter, at least, conceived hope that the bishop of Würzburg would follow his example. The ambassador of Henry of Saxe-Lauenburg, archbishop of Bremen, announced this expectation to his master with great satisfaction.¹

Under these circumstances, it would be difficult to say what the course of Bishop Julius would have been had Truchsess been able to maintain his hold on Cologne ; but when the latter failed so completely, Julius Echter not only resigned all thought of imitating him, but was careful to pursue a totally opposite plan.

¹ Letter of Hermann von der Decken (for Becken must be a false reading), dated 6th Dec. 1582, in Schmidt-Phiseldeck, Historische Miscellaneen, i. 25 : "On the statements and solicitations of the legate, the bishop of Würzburg required time for consideration ; he then ordered his horses and retinue to be prepared, resolving to ride at once to the lord elector of Saxony, and complain of such unheard-of importunity on the part of the pope, also to ask advice, aid, and consolation. The lord elector (of Cologne) has great hope of the most reverend bishops, and believes that their princely graces will revolt from the pope."

Is it to be believed that his utmost wish and purpose was to become absolute master in his episcopal domains? Or had he indeed a profound conviction in his heart that the Catholic faith was the true one? He was a pupil of the Jesuits, and had been educated in the Collegium Romanum. Suffice it to say, that in 1584 he resolved on making a visitation of the churches in a spirit so rigidly Catholic, that nothing like it had before been seen in Germany; this he carried into effect in person, and with all the energy of a determined will.

Accompanied by a certain number of Jesuits, Bishop Julius travelled through the whole of his dominions. He began with Gmünden, thence proceeded to Arnstein, Werneck, Hassfurt, and so on from district to district. In each town he summoned the burgomaster and council to his presence, and declared to all his determination that the errors of Protestantism should be rooted up from the land. The preachers were removed, and their places filled by the pupils of the Jesuits. If any public officer refused to attend the Catholic worship, he was dismissed without mercy; orthodox candidates were ready to fill the place he vacated. Even private individuals were required to take part in the Catholic service,—they had to choose between expatriation and the mass. Whoever regarded the religion of his prince as an abomination was declared incapable of retaining part or lot in his territory.¹ It was in vain that the neighbouring princes remonstrated against these proceedings, Bishop Julius replied to all, that it was not what he was doing that disturbed his conscience, but that he had not begun to do it much earlier. He was most zealously supported by the Jesuits, among whom Father Gerhard Weller was particularly remarked,—alone, on foot, and without even a change of clothing, he went about preaching from town to town. In one year (1586) fourteen cities and market-towns, upwards of two hundred villages, and not less than sixty-two thousand souls, were brought back to Catholicism. The capital of the see was the only town still alienated from the Church, and this the bishop undertook to recover in March, 1587. He caused the town-council to appear before him, and appointed a commissioner for each quarter and parish, by whom every citizen was to be separately interrogated. This investigation shewed that one half of the inhabitants held Protestant opinions. Many were feeble and unsettled in their faith; these readily yielded, and the solemn communion appointed for the celebration of Easter in the cathedral, and at which the bishop himself officiated, was numerously attended. Some held out longer, and a few chose rather to sell their possessions and abandon their country than resign their faith: among these exiles were four members of the town-council.

¹ Biography of Bishop Julius in Gropp's Chronik von Würzburg, p. 335: "they were desired to give up their offices, and seek their living out of the diocese." I have already used this biography, and with it, particularly, Christophori Mariani Augustani Encaenia et Tricennalia Juliana in Gropp's Scriptt. Wirceb. tom. i.

The nearest ecclesiastical neighbour of Würzburg, Ernest von Mengersdorf, bishop of Bamberg, felt himself especially called on to imitate the example thus set by Bishop Julius. There is a well-known hill called Gösweinstein, which rises above the valley of Muggendorf, and to which, even in our own days, pilgrims resort from all the surrounding villages, gaining the summit by steep and lonely paths, leading through majestic woods and wild ravines. An ancient sanctuary of the Trinity existed in this place, but at the time we are speaking of, it was neglected and decayed. In the year 1587, the bishop of Bamberg chanced to visit the sanctuary, and took its condition greatly to heart. Incited by the example of his neighbour, he declared that he also would "recover his subjects to the holy Catholic faith,—no danger should deter him from performing this his duty." We shall have occasion to observe the zeal with which his successor proceeded on the path he marked out.

While measures were thus but in the first stage of preparation at Bamberg, Bishop Julius was effecting a thorough transformation in the religious affairs of Würzburg. All the old ordinances were revived, devotional exercises in honour of the Mother of God were renewed, brotherhoods of the Assumption of the Virgin, the Birth of the Virgin, and many other denominations were again formed. Pilgrimages were undertaken, new modes of devotion were invented, the streets were filled with processions, and the whole country was admonished by church bells at the stated hour for the Ave Maria.¹ Relics were once more collected, and laid with great reverence in pompous shrines. The monasteries were reoccupied, new churches were built in all parts of the diocese: Bishop Julius is said to have laid the foundation of three hundred, which the traveller may still distinguish by their tall and pointed spires. The change thus wrought in a very few years was observed with astonishment. "What but lately," exclaims one of the bishop's eulogists, "would have been called superstitious—nay, even contemptible—is now considered holy; what was formerly accounted a gospel, is now declared to be mere deceit."

Results so important had not been expected even in Rome. The enterprise of Bishop Julius had been for some time in progress before intelligence of it reached Pope Sixtus V. On the close of the autumn holidays in 1586, Acquaviva, general of the Jesuits, appeared before him, and announced the new conquests achieved by his order. Sixtus was in raptures; he hastened to express his acknowledgments to the bishop, and conferred on him the right of nominating to benefices, even during those months reserved to the papal see, declaring that Bishop Julius would best know whom to reward by their possession.

But the joy of Pope Sixtus in Acquaviva's report was greatly increased by the receipt of similar intelligence from the Austrian provinces, and more especially from Styria.

Changes were seen to commence in Styria during that same year when the estates of the province acquired so large an extent of privilege from the edicts of the diet held at Bruck, that their position might be compared with that of the Austrian estates, which had also their council for religious affairs, their superintendents, their synods, and a constitution almost republican.

¹ Julii Episcopi statuta ruralia, Gropp, Scriptt. tom. i. His idea is, that the religious movement, which proceeds from the supreme head of the church of God, communicates itself downwards to every member of the body. See p. 444, de capitulis ruralibus.

• At the very moment when Rudolf II received the oath of allegiance from his subjects, the great difference between himself and his father became apparent to all. He performed the various acts of devotion with the most rigorous exactitude, and his people beheld him with astonishment attending in processions, even during the most severe winter, with uncovered head, and bearing a lighted torch in his hand.

This disposition of the sovereign, and the favour he shewed towards the Jesuits, soon caused great anxiety, and in accordance with the spirit of the times, occasioned a violent counter-movement. No regular church was allowed to the Protestants in Vienna, but they used the Landhaus for their public worship, and the preacher Joshua Opitz, a follower of Flaccius, there inveighed against the Jesuits with all the vehemence peculiar to his sect. Whilst he systematically "thundered against the priests and all the abominations of popery," he awakened not only conviction, but violent rage in the minds of his hearers, so that on leaving the church they felt, as a contemporary of Opitz declares, "inclined to tear the Papists to pieces with their hands."¹ The consequence of this was, that the emperor resolved to prohibit the assemblies in the Landhaus. While this affair was in discussion, and the arguments on both sides were proceeding with passionate eagerness, the nobility, to whom the Landhaus belonged, broke forth into expressions of menace; and while things were thus disturbed, the festival of Corpus Christi arrived. It was the year 1578. The emperor was resolved to celebrate the feast with the utmost solemnity; after he had heard mass in the cathedral, he walked forth with the procession, which was the first that had been seen for a long time. The Host was carried through the streets by a long train of priests, monks, friars, and members of guilds, with the emperor and princes in the midst of them. It was soon manifest that the city was in excessive commotion; when the procession arrived in the peasants' market, it became necessary to remove a few stalls, in order to make it a passage; nothing more was required to create a general tumult. Cries arose on all sides of "To arms! we are betrayed!" The choral followers and priests abandoned the Host, the halberdiers and horse-guards dispersed in all directions, Rudolf found himself in the midst of an enraged multitude; he feared an attack upon his person, and laid his hand on his sword; the princes closed round him with drawn weapons, and prepared to defend their sovereign.¹ It will be readily believed that this occurrence produced a very painful impression on a prince of so much gravity, and so firmly attached to the Spanish dignity and stateliness. The papal nuncio profited by the occasion; he pointed out the danger arising to the person of the emperor from this state of public feeling, and declared that God himself had given him a warning, in that commotion, to delay no longer the fulfilment of the promises he had made to the pope. The Spanish ambassador supported the legate; Magius, the provincial of the Jesuits, had frequently counselled Rudolf to adopt decisive measures, and his advice now received attention. On the 21st of June, the emperor issued an order to Opitz and his assistants, whether in church or school, to leave the city that very day, "while the sun was shining," and to depart, within fourteen days, from the hereditary dominions of Austria. Rudolf expected an insurrection of the people, and had a body of trustworthy men prepared under arms for a case of emergency. But how could any one venture to oppose himself to the sovereign, while he had the letter of the law on his side? The people contented themselves with conducting the exiles on their way with demonstrations of regret and compassion.²

¹ Dr. George Eder, who, be it observed, was an adversary: extract from his Warnungsschrift in Raupach: Evangel. Oestreich. ii, 286.

From that day there commenced a Catholic reaction in Austria, which acquired force and efficiency from year to year.

In the first place it was determined to expel Protestantism from the imperial cities. The towns east of the Ens, which had separated from the estates of the knights and nobles twenty years before, could offer no resistance, the reformed clergy were removed, and their places filled by Catholic priests; private persons were subjected to a close examination. A formula, according to which the suspected were interrogated, has come into our possession. "Dost thou believe," inquires one of its articles, "that every thing is true which the church of Rome has laid down as the rule of life and doctrine?" "Dost thou believe," adds another, "that the pope is the head of the one sole apostolic Church?" No doubt was to be endured.¹ The Protestants were expelled from all offices of state, none were admitted to the class of burghers who did not declare themselves Catholic. In the universities, that of Vienna not excepted, all who applied for a doctor's degree were first required to subscribe the professio fidei. A new regulation for schools was promulgated, which prescribed Catholic formularies, fasts, worship according to the Catholic ritual, and the exclusive use of the catechism arranged by Canisius. In Vienna, all Protestant books were taken away from the booksellers' shops, and were carried in heaps to the episcopal court. Search was made at the custom-houses along the river, all packages were examined, and books or pictures not considered purely Catholic were confiscated.²

¹ Maffei, Annali di Gregorio XIII, tom. i. pp. 281, 385, written without doubt from the reports of the nuncio.

² Sacchinus, pars iv. lib. vi. n. 78: "Pudet referre, quam exeuntes sacrilegos omnique execratione dignissimos prosecuta sit numerosa multitudo quotque benevolentiae documentis, ut vel inde mali gravitas aestimari possit."

With all these severities, the object of the rulers was not yet attained. It is true that in Lower Austria thirteen cities and markets were in a short time restored to the Catholic ritual, and the crown lands and mortgaged property were again in Catholic hands: but the nobility still offered effectual opposition, the towns on the west of the Ens were in close alliance with them, and were too strong to be successfully assailed.³

Many of these measures had nevertheless, as will be readily understood, a general effect from which none could wholly withdraw himself; in Styria they were especially influential, and produced an immediate return to Catholic opinions.

¹ Papal, Austrian, and Bavarian articles of Confession of Faith in Raupach, Evang. Oestreich. ii. 307.

² Khevenhiller, Annales Ferdinandeï, i. 90. Hausitz, Germania Sacra, i. 632.

³ Raupach, Kleine Nachlese: Evang. Oestreich. iv. p. 17.

The Archduke Charles had been compelled to make concessions to his Protestant subjects, at the very moment when in other places the Catholic reaction was proceeding so prosperously. The members of his house found it difficult to pardon him for this. His brother-in-law, Duke Albert of Bavaria, exhorted him to remember that the terms of the peace of Augsburg empowered him to enforce upon his subjects the adoption of the religion professed by himself. He advised the archduke to take three measures: first, to appoint Catholics only to every office about the court, and above all, to the privy council; secondly, to separate the different estates at the diet, since he could more easily deal with each singly; and thirdly, to establish a good understanding with the pope, and to request that a nuncio might reside at his court. Gregory XIII was indeed ready of his own accord to offer assistance. He knew that want of money had been the principal inducement to the archduke's compliance with the demands of his Protestant subjects; he therefore took the best means for rendering him independent of them by transmitting him funds, to the amount, a very large one for those times, of forty thousand scudi. He further deposited a still more important sum in Venice, which was to be at the disposal of the archduke, in the event of disorders arising in the Austrian territories, as a consequence of his efforts for the restoration of Catholicism.

Thus encouraged by example, exhortation, and substantial aid, the Archduke Charles assumed from the year 1580 a much more resolved and imposing attitude.

In that year he affixed an explanation to the concessions he had previously granted, which was in fact tantamount to their revocation. The estates presented the most humble prayers at the footstool of their sovereign, and it seemed for a moment that the urgency of their entreaties was about to prevail;¹ but upon the whole he remained firm; the measures announced were persisted in, and the expulsion of the reformed preachers commenced in the archducal territories.

¹ "Seinem angeborenen mildreichen landsfürstlichen deutschen Gemüth nach:" [according to his inborn, benevolent, patriotic and princely German disposition] says the supplication of the three states,

The year 1584 brought affairs to a decision. In that year the papal nuncio Malaspina made his appearance in the diet. He had succeeded in separating the prelates from the secular estates with which they had always before taken part, and in forming between them; the ministers of the archduke, and the leading Catholics in the country, a strict alliance, of which he was himself the centre. The whole country had hitherto seemed to be Protestant, but Malaspina found means to gather a strong Catholic party round the prince, and, supported by this, the resolutions of the archduke became immutable. He persisted in his determination to root up the Protestant opinions from his territories, declaring that the peace of Augsburg accorded him rights, even over the nobles, beyond any that he had hitherto exercised, and a more obstinate resistance would but induce him to put those rights in force; he should then see who would venture to shew himself rebellious. Menacing as was the tenour of these declarations against the Protestants, yet such was the state of affairs, that they produced him results equally favourable with those he had formerly derived from his concessions. There were various considerations which made it impossible for the estates to refuse the supplies he demanded; they were therefore all conceded.¹

Thenceforward the counter-reformation made progress throughout the archducal territories. The parishes and town-councils were filled with Catholics. No citizen ventured to attend any but a Catholic church, or to send his children to any but the Catholic schools.

The change was not effected peaceably in every instance. The Catholic pastors and the commissioners of the archduke were sometimes met with insult, and driven from the place. The archduke himself was once in some danger when hunting, in consequence of a rumour having spread in the neighbourhood, that a pastor of that district had been taken prisoner. The peasants rushed to their arms, and the poor persecuted preacher was himself obliged to step forward among them for the purpose of protecting his ungracious sovereign from their rage.¹ In defiance of these indications of popular feeling, the changes nevertheless proceeded. The most coercive measures were adopted. A papal historian recapitulates them in few words: "Exile," he says, "confiscation, and severe chastisement, for all who proved refractory." The ecclesiastical princes who had possessions in those districts lent their aid to the temporal authorities. The archbishop of Cologne, who was also bishop of Freisingen, changed the council of his town of Lack, and subjected the Protestant burghers to fines and imprisonment. The bishop of Brixen determined to make a direct transfer of the lands in his lordship of Veldes. Similar dispositions were evident in all the Austrian possessions. Although the Tyrol had remained Catholic, the Archduke Ferdinand thought proper to enforce the most rigid subordination on his clergy, and the regular attendance of all classes at the sacrament. Sunday schools were established for the common people, and Cardinal Andreas, the son of Ferdinand, caused catechisms to be printed, which he distributed to the youth of the schools and to the uneducated classes of all ages.² Nor were these mild measures permitted to suffice in such districts as had received the Protestant doctrines. In the margraviate of Burgau, although but a recent acquisition, and in the bailiwick of Swabia, although the jurisdiction was matter of dispute, the same coercive measures were adopted as had been pursued by the Archduke Charles in Styria.

¹ Valvassor, Ehre des Herzogthums Krain, contains authentic and detailed information on all these affairs. But Maffei, Annali di Gregorio XIII, lib. ix. c. xx., lib. xiii. c. i., gives an especially valuable account. He had, without doubt, the report of the nuncio before him.

For all these things Pope Sixtus could find no eulogies that seemed to him sufficient. He extolled the Austrian princes as the firmest pillars of Christendom. To the Archduke Charles more particularly he sent the most grateful letters.³ The acquisition of a countship, which just then lapsed to the archduke as feudal lord, was considered by the court at Grätz to be a recompense sent directly by Heaven for all the service he had rendered to Christendom.

¹ Khevenhiller, Annales Ferdinandeï II., p. 523.

² Puteo in Tempesti, Vita di Sisto V., tom. i. p. 375.

³ Extract from the briefs, in Tempesti, i. 203.

The Catholic confession owed its return to supremacy in the Netherlands principally to the fact that it had accommodated itself to existing privileges ; but in Germany that was by no means the case. On the contrary, the respective sovereigns of that country extended their power and importance in proportion to their success in promoting Catholic restoration. The intimacy of this connection between the ecclesiastical and political interests, and the extent to which it proceeded, are most remarkably exemplified by Wolf Dietrich von Raittenau, archbishop of Salzburg.

The archbishops of former days, who had lived amidst the tumults of the Reformation, contented themselves with an occasional edict, promulgated to oppose innovations ; with the menace of a punishment or an attempt at conversion ; but all, as Archbishop Jacob says, by mild, paternal, and truthful means.¹

Very different was the disposition of the young archbishop Wolf Dietrich von Raittenau, when he ascended to the archiepiscopal throne of Salzburg in 1587. He had been educated in the Collegium Germanicum in Rome, and was thoroughly imbued with the principles of Catholic restoration. He had seen the brilliant commencement of the administration of Sixtus V, and had conceived extreme admiration for that pontiff. His zeal was further stimulated by the elevation of his uncle Cardinal Altemps, in whose house in Rome he had been brought up, to the purple. In the year 1588, on returning from a journey which had taken him back to the papal court, he proceeded to the execution of the designs formed under the impressions received there. All the citizens of his capital were instantly called on to make public profession of the Catholic faith. Many evinced great reluctance, and he allowed them a few weeks for reflection. Then, on the 3rd of September, 1588, he commanded them to depart within one month from the city and diocese. That one month only, and, after pressing entreaties, the delay of a month longer, was allowed these recusants for the purpose of selling their property. Of this they were required to present an inventory to the archbishop, who would then permit them to sell it to such persons only as were approved by himself.¹ Very few could resolve on deserting their faith, and those who did so were compelled to do public penance in the church with lighted tapers in their hands. The greater number, including many of the most wealthy burghers, preferred to leave their country. The loss of these citizens occasioned no regret to the prince, who believed he had discovered various means of maintaining the splendour of the archbishopric. He had already much increased the taxes, had raised the tolls and duties, imposed new burdens on the salt of Hallein and Schellenberg, converted the contributions in aid of the Turkish war into a regular land-tax, and introduced duties on wine, with an income-tax and legacy-duty. He was entirely regardless of established immunities and vested rights. The dean of the diocese was said to have committed suicide in a fit of despair, at seeing the chapter deprived of its privileges. The principal object of the archbishop's enactments respecting the preparation of salt, and the whole business of mining, was the destruction of the independence enjoyed by the works before his time, and their subjection to the absolute control of his treasury. Throughout Germany no similar example of a regularly organized fiscal system was presented during that century. The young archbishop had brought the ideas of an Italian principality with him across the Alps. The art of raising money appeared to him the most important talent of a statesman, the highest problem of political economy. He had taken Sixtus V as his model; like him he desired to have an obedient, thoroughly Catholic, tribute-paying state in his hands. The expatriation of the principal citizens from Salzburg was even a source of satisfaction to the archbishop, because he considered them rebels. He ordered their deserted houses to be taken down, and palaces in the Roman style to be erected on their sites.¹

¹ It is true that a more severe edict was issued in the name of Jacob, but not until he had been obliged to commit the administration to a coadjutor.

¹ Edict relative to the reformation in Göckingk, Vollkommene Emigrationsgeschichte von denen aus dem Erzbisthum Salzburg vertriebenen Lutheranern, i. p. 88.

Wolf Dietrich was above all things delighted with splendour. He never refused knightly entertainment to any foreigner, and on one occasion appeared at the diet with a train of four hundred persons. In 1588 he was but twenty-nine years of age, buoyant of spirit and full of ambition; he had already fixed his eyes and hopes on the highest ecclesiastical dignities.

The process adopted in the spiritual and secular principalities was repeated, wherever circumstances rendered it practicable, in the cities also. The Lutheran burghers of Gmünden made bitter complaints because they had been struck off the roll of candidates for the town-council. In Biberach, the council appointed by the commissary of Charles V, on the occasion of the Interim, still maintained its ground; the whole town was Protestant, the council alone was Catholic, and carefully excluded every Protestant.² Heavy oppressions were endured by those of the reformed faith in Cologne and Aix-la-Chapelle. The members of the council of Cologne declared that they had promised the emperor and the elector to tolerate no other religion than the Catholic, and they sometimes punished the attendance on a Protestant sermon with fines and imprisonment.³ In Augsburg also, the Catholics gained the upper hand; disturbances occurred on the introduction of the new calendar, and in 1586 the evangelical superintendent was expelled the city; eleven ministers at one time, and a large number of the more determined citizens were also driven forth soon after. Something very similar occurred from similar causes in Ratisbon, during the year 1587. Many other towns began to claim the right of reforming their religious institutions: nay, certain counts, nobles, and knights of the empire who had been converted by some Jesuit, believed themselves entitled to assert a similar right, and each resolved to restore Catholicism in his small domain.

¹ Zauner's Salzburger Chronik, siebenter Theil, is our most important authority on this subject. This part of the Chronicle was itself constructed after a contemporary biography of the archbishop.

² Lehmann, de Pace Religionis, ii. pp. 268, 480.

³ Lehmann, 436, 270.

It was an immeasurable reaction. The Protestant doctrines were now repulsed with an energy equal to that with which they had formerly advanced. Preaching and the inculcation of Catholic doctrines contributed their share to the production of this result, but much more was accomplished by political measures, especial ordinances, and open force.

As the Italian Protestants had formerly fled across the Alps, and sought refuge in Switzerland and Germany, so now were seen far more numerous bodies of German fugitives seeking refuge in the northern and eastern districts, from the oppressions that assailed them in the west and south. The Belgians in like manner retreated to Holland. It was a mighty triumph of Catholicism, which now extended its victories from land to land.

The progress and extension of this triumph were most especially promoted by the nuncios, who at that time began to reside regularly in Germany.

A memoir of the nuncio Minuccio Minucci, dated 1588, is still extant, and we gain from it a clear perception of the views entertained and acted upon in those times.¹

A particular attention was given to the subject of education; it was greatly regretted that the Catholic universities were not better endowed, to the end that they might attract distinguished teachers. Ingolstadt was the only one possessed of means sufficiently ample; as things were, every thing depended on the Jesuit seminaries. It was the wish of Minuccio Minucci, that in these schools there should not be so much attention given to producing great scholars, or profound theologians, as good and effective preachers; a man of moderate acquirements, who did not aspire to the summit of learning, or seek to become renowned, was in his opinion the most extensively useful teacher and most profitable servant of the Church. He recommended that this principle should be acted on in the different institutions for German Catholics in Italy. In the Collegium Germanicum, there had originally been a distinction made in the treatment of young men from noble families, and those of the middle classes. Minucci disapproved of the departure from this custom, which not only made the nobles averse to go thither, but had also the effect of awakening an ambition in the middle class, which could never afterwards be satisfied, and of causing an eagerness for high places, prejudicial to the careful performance of duty in the more humble offices. An attempt was, moreover, then made to attract a third or intermediate class to the colleges, the sons of superior public officers, namely, to whom, according to the common course of things, the principal share in the administration of their native provinces would at some future period be confided. Arrangements had already been made in Perugia and Bologna by Gregory XIII, for the reception of these students. We may here perceive that the distinctions of rank still prevailing in German society were already well defined, even in those days.

¹ Discorso del molto illustre e rev^{mo}. Monsignor Minuccio Minucci, sopra il modo di restituire la Cattolica religione in Alemagna, 1588. MS. Barb. (App. No. 62.)

The principal dependence of the Church was always on the nobles, and to them the nuncio particularly attributed the maintenance of Catholicism in Germany; for to this class the most valuable ecclesiastical appointments belonged as their exclusive right: they defended the Church in consequence as their hereditary property. It was for this reason that they now opposed the introduction of religious freedom into the dioceses;¹ they feared the great number of Protestant princes, who would in that case engross all the benefices. These nobles must be carefully protected and conciliated; they were by no means to be annoyed by the laws against plurality of benefices: in their favour it was decided that there was a certain utility in the change from one residence to another, which tended to unite the nobility of different provinces for the defence of the Church. No attempt ought to be made for the appointment of men from the burgher class to the higher ecclesiastical benefices; a few learned men in a chapter were very useful, as was seen in Cologne; but to carry this practice further would ultimately ruin the German church.

¹ Especially in Southern Germany: "L'esempio della suppressione dell' altre (the northern Germans) ha avvertiti i nobili a metter cura maggiore nella difesa di queste, concorrendo in ciò tanto gli eretici quanto li cattolici, accorti già, che nell' occupatione delli principi si leva a loro et a' posterì la speranza dell' utile che cavano dai canonicati e dagli altri beneficii e che possono pretendere del vescovato mentre a' canonici resti libera l'elettione." [The example of the suppression of the others warned the nobles to be more careful in defence of these, and in this the heretics agreed with the Catholics, both parties perceiving that by the occupation of the princes, themselves and their posterity are deprived of the hope of extracting that profit from the benefices which they may expect from them so long as the canons retain the right of free election.]

The question next arose of how far it might be possible to reclaim to the Catholic faith such districts as had become entirely Protestant.

The nuncio was far from recommending open violence; he considered the Protestant princes much too powerful to be coerced, but he suggested other means by which he thought the end desired might eventually be attained.

He maintained that it was above all things essential to preserve a good understanding between the Catholic sovereigns, particularly between Bavaria and Austria. The treaty of Landsberg was still in existence; he advised that this should be renewed and extended; Philip of Spain he thought might also be advantageously included in that league.

And might it not be possible to win back some of the Protestant princes? The Elector Augustus of Saxony had long been thought to evince a disposition friendly to Catholicism; an attempt had from time to time been made on this sovereign, principally by the intervention of Bavaria; but the utmost caution had been required in these proceedings (the wife of the elector, Anne of Denmark, being firmly attached to the Lutheran doctrines), and they had never produced any useful effect. Anne died in the year 1585, and the day of her death was not only one of deliverance for the oppressed Calvinists, but also afforded to the Catholics an opportunity of again approaching the elector. It would seem that Bavaria, which had before laboured in this cause, was now making arrangements for a further effort, and Pope

Sixtus V held himself ready to forward absolution for the elector to Germany.¹ But before any thing could be effected, Augustus himself expired. The Catholics had, however, other princes in view. It was thought that Louis, count palatine of Neuburg, displayed indifference to all proposals of hostility to Catholicism, and was particularly forbearing towards the Catholic priests who were occasionally found in his dominions. William IV of Hesse, also a pacific and learned prince, was observed to accept occasionally the dedication of Catholic books; to these sovereigns particular attention was directed, nor were the higher members of the German nobility in the northern districts left out of consideration; hopes were especially entertained of Heinrich Ranzau.

¹ As early as 1574, Duke Albert of Bavaria was encouraged by Gregory XIII "ut, dum elector Saxoniae Calvinistarum sectam ex imperii sui finibus exturbare conabatur, vellet sermones cum principe illo aliquando habitos de religione catholica in Saxonia introducenda renovare." The pope thought it advisable to send an agent to the court of Saxony; but this Duke Albert opposed, saying, the matter would then become known to the elector's councillors: "Ad consiliarios et familiares: a quibus quid expectandum aliud quam quod totam rem pervertant?" He goes on to say: "Arte hic opus esse judicatur, qua tanquam aliud agens errantem pie circumveniat.—Uxor, quo ex sexu impotentiori concitatio est, eo importuniora suffundet consilia, si resciscat hanc apud maritum rem agi." Legationes Paparum ad Duces Bavariae, MS. in the Library of Munich. Minucci informs us that the first overtures were made to Augustus in the days of Pius V. The whole passage is remarkable: "Con duca Augusto di Sassonia già morto trattò sin a tempi della s. m. di papa Pio V il duca Alberto di Baviera, che vive in cielo, e ridusse la pratica tanto inanzi che si prometteva sicura riuscita: ma piacque a Dio benedetto di chiamarlo, nè d'opera di tanta importanza fu chi parlasse o pensasse, se non ch'aveva di Gregorio di gl. mem. il padre Possevino s'ingegnò di fabbricare sopra quei fundamenti: et in fine nel presente felicissimo pontificato di Sisto, sendo morta la moglie d'esso duca Augusto, fu chi ricordò l'occasione esser opportuna per trattare di nuovo la conversione di quel principe: ma la providentia divina non li diede tempo di poter aspettare la benedictione che S. Beat^{mo} pur per mezzo del signor duca Guilielmo di Baviera s'apparecchiava di mandarli sin a casa sua." [Even from the times of Pope Pius V, of blessed memory, Duke Albert of Bavaria, who lives in heaven, laboured hard with Duke Augustus of Saxony, now dead, and brought things so far, that there was good hope of success. But it pleased God to call him away, and no one remained to think or speak of so great a work till the days of Gregory, of glorious memory, when Father Possevin set himself to work upon those foundations; and, finally, in the present most fortunate pontificate of Sixtus, the wife of the said Duke Augustus being dead, there were those who thought the occasion favourable for again attempting the conversion of that prince. But divine providence did not grant him time to await the benediction which his holiness was preparing to bestow upon him, sending it by means of Duke William of Bavaria, even to his own house.] We hence discover how early that line (of the Saxon princes) was practised upon.

The results of these purposes and endeavours were indeed remote, and could perhaps not be safely calculated on; but there were other projects, the execution of which depended more on their own determination and force of will.

The nuncio affirmed that the greater number of the assessors in the supreme court of the empire (Kammergericht) were even yet disposed to Protestantism. There still survived men of that earlier period, when Protestants, either concealed or openly professed, sat in the councils of most sovereigns, even in those of Catholic countries. The nuncio thought this circumstance well calculated to "drive the Catholics to despair," and was urgent in his entreaties for a remedy. He believed that it would not be difficult to compel the assessors of Catholic countries to make a profession of faith, while all newly-appointed members might be required to take an oath that they would either not change their religion, or would resign their offices. He maintained that the preponderance in the Kammergericht belonged of right to the Catholics.

The nuncio did not yet abandon the hope of retrieving the lost bishoprics,—he believed this might be done without using violence, if existing rights were efficiently asserted. These bishoprics had not yet wholly broken off all connection with Rome; the ancient right of the Curia to fill up the benefices which became vacant during the reserved months was not absolutely denied. The Protestant bishops themselves still believed that their nomination required to be confirmed by the sanction of the pope, and Henry of Saxe-Lauenburg had an agent at Rome to procure this confirmation in his case. If the papal see had not yet derived all the advantage from this deferential feeling that might have been drawn from it, that was the consequence of a practice on the part of the emperor, who supplied the place of the papal sanction by a dispensation (indulto) from himself. The appointments to the vacant benefices made in Rome always came too late, or some error of form was discovered in them, so that the chapters were always legally free to make their own choice. Minucci now earnestly pressed the emperor to abstain from granting dispensations; and in the state of feeling then prevalent at the imperial court, he readily obtained a promise to that effect. Duke William of Bavaria had already proposed confiding the nomination to benefices, either to the nuncio or to some trustworthy German bishop. Minucci was of opinion that a dataria should be established in Rome expressly for Germany; that a list of noble Catholics, properly qualified, should be kept there; which list could easily be prepared and duly rectified, as changes should occur, by means of the nuncio or the Jesuits; all vacancies could then be filled without delay, in accordance with the guide and standard thus obtained. No chapter would venture to reject the candidates legally nominated by Rome, and the Curia would acquire great consideration and a large extent of influence from this measure.

We cannot fail to perceive that the complete restoration of the Church to its former authority was sought for with constancy of will and great energy. To conciliate the nobles, to allure the higher classes of the citizens into the Roman interest, to educate the youth under the influence of Rome, to regain the ancient power over the bishoprics, even over those that had become Protestant, to recover supremacy in the Kammergericht, to convert powerful princes of the empire, and to secure to the leading Catholic sovereigns a voice in the affairs of the German confederation; such, and so numerous, were the projects to be undertaken at one and the same time.

And we are not to believe that these suggestions and counsels were treated with neglect; at the moment when they were laid before the authorities in Rome, preparations were made in Germany for carrying them into effect.

The efficiency and good order of the Kammergericht depended in a great measure on the yearly visitations which were made during the sittings of the diet by seven estates of the empire in rotation. In these visitations the majority had for the most part been Catholic; but in the year 1588, it was Protestant,—the Protestant archbishop of Magdeburg, among others, was to take share in it. The Catholic party resolved that this should not be permitted; and when the elector of Mainz proceeded to summon the estates, the emperor, of his own authority, commanded him to postpone the visitation for that year. But the omission of one year availed nothing,—the order of succession remained as before. A Protestant archbishop of Magdeburg was long to be feared: it thus happened that the prorogation was repeated from year to year, the ultimate consequence being that no regular visitation was ever held again; an omission from which that noble institution of the highest tribunal in the empire suffered irreparable injury.¹ Complaints soon arose that unlearned Catholics were preferred in that body to learned Protestants. The emperor also desisted from granting the “indulto.” In 1588, Minucci advised that attempts should be made for the conversion of Protestant princes; and in 1590 one had already been gained over; this was Jacob of Baden, who takes the first place in a long series.

10. THE LEAGUE

The great movement thus engrossing Germany and the Netherlands extended its influence over France also, with irresistible force. The affairs of the Netherlands had, for a long period of time, been intimately connected with those of France. The French Protestants had frequently given assistance to those of the Netherlands, and the latter were equally ready to lend their aid to the Protestants of France. The ruin of Protestantism in the Belgian provinces was an immediate injury to the French Huguenots.

¹ Minucci had besides written to Rome especially on the subject of the Kammergericht; and there is cause for believing that his representations occasioned the inhibition. He regarded the Protestant majority with detestation, as we have said; “non vole dir altro l’aver gli eretici l’autorità maggiore e li piu voti in quel senato, che un ridurre i cattolici d’Alemania a disperatione” [that the heretics should have the superior power and the larger number of votes in that senate, is no other than a reduction of the German Catholics to despair.]

But in addition to this came the fact, that in France, as well as other countries, the tendency towards a restoration of Catholicism was constantly gaining extension of influence and increase of power.

The first appearance of the Jesuits has been already noticed, and from that time they had continued to make progress: they were more especially patronised, as will be readily supposed, by the house of Lorraine. Cardinal Guise established a school for them, in 1574, at Pont-à-Mousson, which was frequented by the princes of his house. The duke created a college at Eu in Normandy, which was at the same time intended for the reception of fugitives from England.

They had, besides, many other patrons,—sometimes it was a cardinal, a bishop, or an abbot,—sometimes a prince or high officer of the state, who took upon himself the cost of a new establishment. In a short time they had settled themselves at Rbuen, Verdun, Dijon, Bourges, and Nevers, while their missionaries traversed the kingdom in all directions.

But they found auxiliaries in France, with whose aid they had been obliged to dispense in Germany.

The cardinal of Lorraine had brought a few Capuchin friars with him from the council of Trent, and had assigned them an abode in his palace at Meudon; but on his death they departed, the order being at that time restricted to Italy by its statutes. In the year 1573, the chapter-general sent a few of the brethren across the mountains for the purpose of first trying the ground. They were so well received that on their return they promised "the richest harvest," and the pope did not hesitate to remove the restriction confining them to Italy. The first colony of Capuchins took their way across the Alps in the year 1574; they were conducted by Fra Pacifico di San Gervaso, who had been permitted to select his associates according to his own judgment.

These Capuchins were all Italians, and they naturally attached themselves in the first instance to their own country-people.

They were joyfully received by Queen Catherine, who instantly founded a monastery for them in Paris. So early as the year 1575, they had gained a settlement in Lyons also, where they received the support of certain Italian money-changers, at the recommendation of the queen.

From these central points they soon extended themselves into the country, from Paris to Caen and Rouen, from Lyons to Marseilles, where Queen Catherine bought them ground for building. In 1582, they formed a new colony in Toulouse, and in 1585 another in Verdun: they very soon succeeded in making the most brilliant conversions, as, for example, in 1587, that of Henri Joyeuse, one of the first men of his day in France.¹

These religious movements produced a more powerful effect in France, at least in one respect, than they had even done in Germany, since they gave rise to institutions, imitated, it is true, from existing ones, but with forms entirely peculiar. Jean de la Barriere, who had obtained the Cistercian abbey of Feuillans, near Toulouse, at the age of nineteen, by favour of the strange abuses that had become prevalent in the church of France, now caused himself to be consecrated regular abbot (in 1577), and received novices, with whom he endeavoured, not only to renew, but even to exceed, the austerities practised by the original institution of Citeaux. Solitude, silence, and abstemiousness were carried to the utmost extremity. These monks never left their convent except for the purpose of preaching in the neighbouring districts: within their walls they wore no shoes, and no covering for the head; they abstained, not only from meat and wine, but even from eggs and fish, living on bread and water, the utmost addition being a few vegetables.² These severities did not fail to excite reverence and call forth imitation. Dom Jean de la Barriere was in a short time invited to the court at Vincennes. He traversed a large part of France with sixty-two companions, never permitting the slightest interruption to the ascetic practices of the convent. His institute was shortly afterwards confirmed by the pope, and extended its influence throughout the kingdom.

¹ Boverio, Annali dei frati Capuccini, i. 546; ii. 45, f.

² Felibien, Histoire de Paris, tom. ii. p. 1158.

The whole body of the secular clergy seemed also to be inspired by a new zeal, and although holding their appointments in perfect freedom from all responsibility, the parish priests once more applied themselves sedulously to the care of souls. In 1570, the bishops not only demanded the adoption of the decrees promulgated by the council of Trent, but even required the abrogation of the concordat to which they owed their own existence. These propositions they renewed from time to time with increased urgency.¹

Who shall attempt accurately to define all the causes by which the religious feelings of the period were induced to take this direction? We can be certain of the facts only, and these shew that a very important change became manifest about the year 1580. A Venetian writer asserts that the number of Protestants had diminished by seventy per cent., and that the mass of the people had again become decidedly Catholic. The excitement of novelty and the energy of impulse were now acting on the side of Catholicism.²

But under these circumstances the Catholic spirit assumed a new position in regard to the regal authority.

The court was living in a state of continual self-contradiction; Henry III was unquestionably a good Catholic; no one could expect favour at his hands who did not attend the mass; he would not suffer Protestants to hold the magistracy in any town of his kingdom; but notwithstanding all this, he continued now as in former times to dispose of ecclesiastical appointments in accordance with the exigencies of court favour, and without the slightest regard either to worth or talent; neither did he cease to appropriate and squander the property of the Church. He delighted in processions, practised various devotional exercises, and spared himself no penance; but this did not prevent him from leading the most disgraceful life, or from permitting others to lead it also,—an abandoned licentiousness was the fixed habit of the court; the profligate excesses committed during the carnival provoked the anger of the preachers, some of the courtiers were refused Christian burial on account of the circumstances attending their death, and the expressions uttered by them in their last moments: this happened even in the case of the king's especial favourites.

¹ Rémontrance de l'Assemblée générale du Clergé de France, convoquée en la Ville de Melun, faite au Roi Henri III le 3 Juillet, 1579. Recueil des Actes du Clergé, tom. xiv. Thuanus also gives an extract.

² Lorenzo Priuli, Relatione di Franza, 5 Giugno, 1582. "Dovemo maravigliarci umanamente parlando, che le cose non siano in peggiore stato di quello che si trovano; poichè per gratia di Dio, con tutto il poco pensiero che li è stato messo e che se li mette, è sminuito il numero degli Ugonotti 70%, et è grande il zelo et fervor che mostrano cattolici nelle cose della religione."

Thus, the rigid spirit of Catholicism prevailing, though favoured in many ways by the court, was yet in effect and essentially in direct opposition to it.

The king, moreover, persevered in the old system of politics, which was manifested principally in his hostility to Spain. At any other time this would have signified nothing; but at the moment we are treating of, the religious principle, even in France, was more powerful than regard for national interests; as the Huguenots felt bound to the Protestants of the Netherlands, so did the Catholics consider themselves the natural allies of Philip II and Farnese. The Jesuits, who had performed so many services for the Spanish power in the Netherlands, could not look on without alarm, when it became obvious to them that the enemies they had combated there were receiving aid and support in France.

To this cause of uneasiness was added the death of the duke of Alençon, which took place in 1584, and as the king had no heir, nor any hope of one, Henry of Navarre became presumptive heir to the throne.

The fear of future evil has perhaps more influence over the minds of men than a misfortune actually present; the prospect of Henry's accession caused the utmost agitation among the French Catholics,¹ and above all, as was natural, in the Guises, the old antagonists of Navarre, who feared the influence he must acquire even as heir to the throne—how much more then the power he would exercise as king. We cannot be surprised that they should look to Philip of Spain for support.

¹ A document was at that time published in Rome, shewing how desirable it was that a Guise should succeed to the throne: "Della inclinazione de' cattolici verso la casa di Ghisa e del servitio che riceverà la christianità et il re cattolico della successione di uno di quei principi." This paper was sent to Spain; it was ascribed to Cardinal d'Este. Dispaccio Veneto, 1584, 1mo Dchr.

And nothing could be more welcome to that monarch in the general state of his policy at that moment. He was not withheld by any scruple from entering into a formal treaty with the subjects of a foreign prince.

The principal question remaining was, whether Rome, where the union of princes with the Church had been so much talked of, would sanction the insurrection of powerful vassals against their sovereign.

And it cannot be denied that this sanction was accorded. There were some of the Guise party whose consciences were uneasy at the step about to be taken; the Jesuit Matthieu therefore proceeded to Rome for the purpose of obtaining a declaration from the pope, by which their scruples might be set at rest. On hearing the representations of Matthieu, Gregory declared that he fully approved the intention of the French princes to take up arms against heretics, and that he removed every scruple they might entertain on the subject. He had no doubt but that the king would himself approve their purpose; but even if he should not do so, they must nevertheless proceed with their plans, and pursue them till they achieved the grand object of exterminating the heretics.¹ The process against Henry of Navarre had been already commenced; before its conclusion Sixtus V had ascended the papal throne, and he pronounced sentence of excommunication against Navarre and Condé. By this act he gave a more effectual assistance to the purposes of the League than he could have afforded by any other mode of co-operation.²

The Guises had already taken arms, and laboured to get as many provinces and fortified towns as they possibly could into their own hands.

At the first movement they made themselves masters of many important places, as Verdun, Toul, Lyons, Bourges,

¹ Claude Matthieu au duc de Nevers, 11 Févr. 1585. This is perhaps the most important piece of information given in the whole fourth volume of Capefigue, Réforme, &c., p. 173.

² Maffei, Historiarum ab Excessu Gregorii XIII. lib. i. p. 10: "Infinitis foederatorum precibus et regis Philippi supplicatione hortatuque haud aegre se adduci est passus, ut Hugonotas eorumque duces coelestibus armis insectaretur."

Orleans, and Mezières, without drawing a sword. To avoid the appearance of being vanquished by force, the king then resorted to a method he had already adopted, and declared their cause his own. But in order to be admitted to their alliance, he was obliged to ratify and extend the conquest of the League by formal treaty, and saw himself obliged to surrender Burgundy, Champagne, a great part of Picardy, and many fortified places in other parts of the kingdom, to the possession of the Guise party.¹

These things being arranged, the king and the Guises proceeded to prosecute the war against the Protestants in common. But with how great a difference! The king took half-measures only, and all were utterly ineffectual. The Catholics even suspected him of wishing success to the Protestant arms, that so he might seem to be compelled by the menacing aspect of their force to conclude a peace disadvantageous to the Catholic interest. Guise, on the contrary, took an oath, that should God grant him victory, he would not dismount from his horse until he had established the Catholic religion in France for ever. With his own troops, and not those of the king, he surprised the Germans at Auneau, when they were marching to the assistance of the Huguenots, whose best hopes were placed on their aid, and annihilated them completely.

The pope compared him with Judas Maccabeus. He was indeed a man whose grandeur of character commanded the passionate homage of the people, and he became the idol of all Catholics.

The king was, on the contrary, in a position of the utmost difficulty; he did not know what to do, nor even what to desire. The papal ambassador, Morosini, declared that he seemed to consist, as it were, of two persons: he wished for the downfall of the Huguenots, and dreaded it quite as much; he feared the defeat of the Catholics, and yet desired it: such was the effect of this mental discord, that he no longer dared to follow his own inclinations, and could not even trust his own thoughts.²

¹ Reflections of Cardinal Ossat on the effects of the League in France: Life of Cardinal Ossat, i. 44.

² Dispaccio Morosini in Tempesti, Vita di Sisto V, p. 346: "Il re,

* This was a state of mind which inevitably deprived him of the confidence of all, and could not but tend to utter ruin.

The Catholics firmly believed that the very man who had placed himself at their head was secretly opposed to them. Every transient occasion of intercourse with the adherents of Navarre, every mark of favour, however trifling, bestowed on a Protestant, was counted against him; all maintained that the most Christian king himself was the principal hindrance to a complete restoration of Catholicism, and they detested the king's favourites, and above all the duke d'Epemon, with hatred all the more bitter, because Henry set him up in opposition to the Guises, and intrusted to him the most important governments of the realm.

Under these circumstances, there was formed by the side of the league of the princes an alliance, whose members were of the burgher class, but whose object was equally the support of Catholicism. In every town the populace was acted on by preachers, who combined a furious opposition to the government with a vehement zeal for religion. In Paris things were carried still further; the project of a popular union for the defence of the Catholic faith was there formed, the first movers being three preachers and an influential citizen.¹ They bound themselves by oath, in the first instance, to shed the last drop of their blood in this tutto che sia monarca sì grande, è altrettanto povero; e quanto è povero, è altrettanto prodigo; dimostra insigne pietà, e nel stesso tempo aborrisce la sagra lega: è in campo contra gli heretici, e pure è geloso de' progressi cattolici."

¹ The Anonymo Capitolino, on the Life of Sixtus V, has some original information on this subject. He calls the founder Carlo Ottomani, "cittadino onorato;" it was Charles Hotman who first communicated his plans to the preachers. At their very first meeting, Ottomani proposed an alliance with the princes; at the second, Jan. 25, 1587, it was resolved to nominate sixteen persons, one for each quarter, "a cui si riferisse da persone fidate quanto vi si facesse e dicesse appartenente a fatti publici" [to whom should be reported by trusty persons, whatever was said or done in them relating to public affairs]. In the third meeting, which took place on Candlemas-day, a council of ten persons was named, with the right of raising contributions, and a deputation to the duke de Guise was at once agreed on. This account makes important additions to all we find regarding this matter in Cayet, from Manaut and Maheutre, and in Poulain, De Thou, and Davila.

cause. Each then named a few trusty friends, and the first meeting was held at the cell of a monk in the Sorbonne.¹ They soon perceived the possibility of comprising the whole city in their union; a small number was selected to form a committee, and conduct the movement; these men were empowered to levy money in any case demanding it. A member was appointed as superintendent for each of the sixteen quarters of the city; the enrolling of members proceeded rapidly, and with the utmost secrecy. The qualifications of candidates were first discussed in the committee, and if they were not approved, no further communication was made to them. They had agents in all the colleges, one for the audit-office, one for the procurators of the court, one for the clerks, one for the greffiers, &c. In a short time the whole city, which had before received a Catholic military organization, was comprehended in this more secret and more effective league; but not satisfied with Paris, its branches were sent forth to Orleans, Lyons, Toulouse, Bordeaux, and Rouen, where associations were also formed, which despatched their delegates to the confederates in Paris. All then solemnly pledged themselves to labour for the removal of government abuses, and above all, to endure the presence of no Huguenot in France.

This is the compact known as the League of the Sixteen. When its members found themselves arrived at a certain degree of strength, they gave notice to the Guises; and Mayenne, the brother of the duke, came with the most profound secrecy to Paris, when the union between the princes and the citizens was completed.¹

Henry III already felt the ground trembling beneath his feet. The proceedings of his enemies were reported to him from day to day. In the Sorbonne they had become so bold as to propose the question whether it were permitted to withdraw allegiance from a prince who neglects to perform his duty; and to this question a reply was returned in the affirmative by a council of from thirty to forty doctors. The king was excessively irritated; he threatened to do as

¹ "Nel palazzo di Rens, dietro alla chiesa di S. Agostino, . . . giurarono tutti una scambievol lega non solo defensiva ma assoluta," (Anonimo Capitol.)

Pope Sixtus had done, and chain the refractory preachers to the galleys; but he did not possess the energy of the pontiff, and contented himself with ordering the advance of the Swiss who were in his service to the neighbourhood of the capital.

Alarmed by the menace implied in this movement, the citizens sent to Guise entreating him to come and protect them. The king caused it to be intimated to him that a compliance with this request would be viewed unfavourably; but the duke appeared in Paris nevertheless.

Every thing now seemed ready for a great explosion.

The king commanded the Swiss to enter Paris, when it instantly burst forth. The city was immediately barricaded, the Swiss were driven back, and the Louvre was menaced. The king had no alternative but flight.¹

The duke of Guise had before been master of a large portion of France; he was now in possession of Paris. The Bastille, the Arsenal, the Hôtel de Ville, and all the surrounding places fell into his hands. The king was completely overpowered. He was very soon compelled to pronounce an interdict against the Protestant religion, and to resign various fortified places to the Guises, in addition to those they already held. The duke of Guise might now be considered as lord of half France, and Henry III gave him legal authority over the other half, by conferring on him the dignity of lieutenant-general of the kingdom. The States were convoked, and there could be no doubt but that Catholic opinions would predominate in that assembly. The most decisive measures were to be expected from it, ruinous for the Huguenots, and entirely to the advantage of the Catholic party.

¹ Maffei blames Guise for having suffered this: "Inanis popularis auræ et infaustæ potentiae ostentatione contentus, Henricum incolumem abire permittit." (i. i. 38.)

II. SAVOY AND SWITZERLAND

It will be readily perceived that the preponderance of Catholicism in the mighty realm of France would inevitably produce a corresponding effect on the neighbouring kingdoms and communities.

The Catholic cantons of Switzerland attached themselves more closely than ever to the ecclesiastical principle and to the Spanish alliance.

The establishment of a permanent "nunciature" was productive of the most remarkable effects in Switzerland as well as in Germany.

In the year 1586, and immediately after the adoption of this measure, the Catholic cantons united to form the Golden or Borromean League, in which they bound themselves and their descendants for ever, "to live and die in the true, undoubted, ancient, apostolic Roman Catholic faith."¹ Thereupon they received the Host from the hand of the nuncio.

If the party by which the administrative power was seized at Mühlhausen in the year 1587, had gone over to the Catholic creed, as they seemed on the point of doing, and if they had done so at the right moment, they would have been supported without doubt by the Catholics: conferences had already been held on the subject at the house of the nuncio in Lucerne; but the people of Mühlhausen deliberated too long. The Protestants, on the contrary, pressed forward their expedition with the utmost promptitude, and re-established the old government, which was upon the whole favourable to themselves.²

It was, however, at this moment that the three forest

¹ "Ihre ewigen Nachkommen" (Their eternal posterity). This is the expression used in the records of the league.—Lauffer: Beschreibung helvetischer Geschichte, vol. x. p. 331.

² The importance of the Mühlhausen affair, as regarded religion, is made very evident by the narrative of the Anonimo Capitol., founded on the reports of the nuncio, to which we shall again refer in examining Tempesti.

Cantons, in concert with Zug, Lucerne, and Freiburg, took a new and most important step. After long negotiations, they concluded a treaty with Spain on the 12th of May, 1587, in which they promised to maintain perpetual friendship with the king, and conceded to him the right of raising recruits in their territories, and of marching his troops through their mountains; Philip, on his side, making corresponding concessions to them. But the most important part of their mutual engagement was that each promised to aid the other to the utmost extent of their powers, in the event of either being involved in war on account of the holy apostolic religion.¹ And in this treaty the six cantons made no exception; not even in favour of the confederated cantons; on the contrary, it was against them in particular that this part of the treaty must have been arranged, seeing that there was no other power with which there was any probability of their being involved in a war from motives of religion.

Here also, then, how much more powerful was the influence of religious feeling than that of national attachment! A community of faith now united the ancient Switzer with the house of Austria! The Confederation became for the moment a secondary consideration.

It was most fortunate that no cause for immediate hostilities arose. The influence of this league was therefore confined in the first instance to Geneva.

Charles Emanuel, duke of Savoy, a prince whose whole life had been marked by restless ambition, had often evinced a desire to seize the first favourable occasion for regaining possession of Geneva, regarding himself as the legitimate sovereign of that city; but his purposes had hitherto been always defeated by opposition from the Swiss and French, from both of whom the Genevese received protection.

But circumstances were now altered; under the influence of Guise, Henry III promised, in the summer of 1588, that he would no longer impede any enterprise undertaken against Geneva.

Receiving this intimation, the duke prepared himself for the attack. The Genevese did not lose their courage, and made occasional incursions on the ducal territories. But, on this occasion, Berne afforded them but very insufficient aid. The Catholic party had insinuated their partisans into the very midst of this city, closely interwoven as it was with Protestant interests; there was a faction there which would not have been unwilling to see Geneva fall into the hands of the duke.¹ It thus happened that he very soon gained the advantage. He had hitherto held the countships bordering on Geneva under closely limited conditions, imposed on him by former treaties of peace with Berne; he now seized the occasion, and made himself for the first time master in those districts. He expelled the Protestants, whom he had previously been obliged to tolerate, and made the whole country exclusively Catholic. Charles Emanuel had till that time been prohibited from erecting fortresses in that portion of his territories; he then built them in places where he could make them serve not only for defence, but also for harassing Geneva.

¹ Traité d'alliance faite entre Philippe II, &c. Dumont, Corps Diplomatique, vol. i. p. 459.

But before these affairs had proceeded further, other enterprises had been undertaken, from which consequences of much more extensive importance might be expected, and which seemed not unlikely to produce a complete revolution in all the relations of Europe.

12. ATTACK ON ENGLAND

The Netherlands were in great part subdued, and negotiations had already commenced for the voluntary submission of the remainder. In Germany, the efforts of Catholicism had prevailed in many districts, and a project was conceived, ¹ The fifth article of the treaty leaves no doubt on the subject, even though the judicial evidence of guilt on the part of Wattenwyl is involved to a certain extent in obscurity. Extracts from contemporary pamphlets, and from the acts of the Council of Berne, are to be found in Gelzer, Die drei letzten Jahrhunderte der Schweizergeschichte, vol. i. pp. 128, 137.

By which those yet wanting to their triumph might be overcome. In France, the champion of Catholicism was proceeding on a path that by victories, investment of fortresses, attachment of the people, and legitimate authority, seemed inevitably leading him to the possession of exclusive sovereignty. The ancient metropolis of the Protestant faith, the city of Geneva, was no longer protected by her former allies. At this moment the plan was formed of laying the axe to the root of the tree by an attack on England.

The central point of the Protestant power and policy was without doubt in England; the provinces of the Netherlands yet remaining unsubdued, as well as the Huguenots of France, found their principal support in Queen Elizabeth.

But the internal struggle had, as we have seen, already commenced even in England. Swarms of Jesuits and pupils from the seminaries, impelled by religious enthusiasm, sedulously cultivated for this very purpose, and by the desire to revisit their native country, were constantly pouring into the kingdom; Elizabeth opposing them by the utmost severity of laws enacted to that end. In the year 1582, it was declared high treason to attempt the perversion of one of her subjects from the established religion of the realm to that of Rome.¹ In 1585, she commanded all Jesuits and priests of the seminaries to depart from England within forty days, under pain of being punished as traitors, much in the same manner as so many Catholic princes had dealt with the Protestants in driving them from their several territories.² To this effect she then brought the high court of commission into operation; a tribunal expressly appointed to take cognizance of all offences against the acts of Supremacy and Uniformity, not only in accordance with the usual forms of law, but by all means that could be devised, even to the exaction of a corporal oath; a kind of Protestant Inquisition.³ Elizabeth was, nevertheless, extremely anxious to avoid the appearance of attacking liberty of conscience. She affirmed that the Jesuits were not seeking the restoration of their religion, but that their purpose was to lead the people to an insurrection against the government, and thus prepare the way for foreign enemies. The missionaries protested "before God and the saints," "before heaven and earth" (as they expressed themselves), that their object was entirely and solely religious, and in nowise regarded the queen's majesty.¹ But what understanding could discriminate between these motives? The queen's inquisitors were not to be satisfied with a simple affirmation. They demanded an explicit declaration, as to whether or not the anathema pronounced against Elizabeth by Pius V was lawful and binding on Englishmen. The prisoners were also required to say what they would do, and to which side they would attach themselves, in the event of the pope's absolving them from their allegiance, and making an attack on England. The harassed and frightened men saw no means of extricating themselves from such a dilemma. They made an attempt by declaring that they would render unto Caesar the things which were Caesar's, and unto God the things which were God's; but their judges interpreted this subterfuge itself as a confession. The prisons were accordingly crowded; execution was followed by execution; and Catholicism also had its martyrs. Their number in the reign of Elizabeth has been calculated at two hundred. The zeal of the missionaries was not subdued by this oppression, as will be readily comprehended. The number of the refractory, the recusants, as they were called, increased with the increasing severity of the laws, and their exasperation increased in like proportion. Pamphlets were circulated even about the court, in which the act of Judith in destroying Holofernes was held up as an example of piety and heroic courage worthy of imitation. The eyes of the greater number were still turned towards the imprisoned queen of Scotland, who, according to the papal decision, was the legitimate queen of England. They cherished a constant hope that a general revolution would be brought about by an attack from the Catholic sovereigns. In Italy and Spain the most fearful representations were circulated of cruelties practised on the true believers in England; accounts that could not fail to excite abhorrence in every Catholic heart.¹

¹ Camden, Rerum Anglicarum Annales regnante Elizabetha, i. p. 349.

² Ibid. p. 396.

³ "As well by the oaths of twelve good and lawful men, as also by witnesses, and all other means and ways you can devise."—Neal, History of the Puritans, vol. i. p. 414. It should at least have been "lawful means and ways."

¹ Campiani vita et martyrium, p. 159: "Coram Deo profiteor et angelis eius, coram coelo terraque, coram mundo et hoc cui adsto tribunali,—me nec criminis laesae majestatis nec perduellionis nec ullius in patriam coniurationis esse reum," &c.

No man took more earnest part in this feeling than Pope Sixtus V. It is, doubtless, true, that he felt a sort of esteem for the personal qualities of Queen Elizabeth: her high and dauntless spirit awakened his admiration, and he even sent her an invitation to return into the bosom of the Catholic church. How extraordinary a proposition was this! As if the power to choose remained with her: as if all her previous life, all that gave importance to her existence, her position in the world, had not bound her irrevocably to the interests of Protestantism; even though her convictions had not been entirely sincere. Elizabeth replied not a word; but she laughed. When the pope heard this, he declared that he must then think of means for depriving her of her dominions by force.

Before that time he had but hinted at such a design, but in the spring of 1586 he openly proceeded to active measures, and boasted that he would support Philip of Spain in his enterprise against England with assistance of a very different character from that furnished to Charles V by earlier popes.²

In January, 1587, he made loud complaints of the dilatory proceedings of Spain, and insisted on the numerous advantages the king would derive from a victory over

¹ Theatrum crudelitatum haereticorum nostri temporis. It begins with: "Peculiaris descriptio crudelitatum et immanitatum schismaticorum Angliae regnante Henrico VIII," and concludes with: "Inquisitionis Anglicanae et facinorum crudelium Machiavellianorum in Anglia et Hibernia a Calvinistis protestantibus sub Elizabetha etiamnum regnante peractorum descriptiones." Plates are added, depicting unheard of tortures, a most horrible sight.

² Dispaccio Gritti, 31 Maggio, 1586: "Accresciuto quatro volto tanto. Il papa vorria che si fingesse d'andar contra Draco e si piegasse poi in Inghilterra." [The pope will send him four times as much; he desires that a feint should be made of going to encounter Drake, but that the expedition should then turn towards England.]

England in relation to his future efforts for the perfect subjugation of the Netherlands.¹

He soon became much irritated by the delays of Spain. When Philip II published a "pragmatica," imposing restrictions on all ecclesiastical dignitaries, and consequently affecting those claimed by the Roman Curia in his dominions, the pope burst into a flaming passion. "What," he exclaimed, "can Don Philip conduct himself thus violently against us, while he permits himself to be maltreated by a woman?"²

And the king was certainly not spared by Elizabeth; she openly took part with the people of the Netherlands, and her admirals, Drake in particular, made every coast of Europe and America insecure. What Pope Sixtus had uttered was in fact the question secretly asked by all Catholics,—they were astonished at the long endurance of that mighty sovereign, and the many injuries he had suffered without avenging them. The cortes of Castile exhorted him no longer to defer the exaction of vengeance.

Philip received even personal insults. He was made the subject of mockery in masks and comedies. This was on one occasion reported to him, when the aged monarch, who had always been accustomed to reverence, sprang up from his chair in a state of irritation, such as had never before been seen in him.

In these dispositions were the pope and king, when they received intelligence that Elizabeth had caused the imprisoned queen of Scotland to be put to death. This is not the place to inquire into the legal right she may have had for commanding this execution: it must, upon the whole, be regarded as an act of political justice. The first thought of it arose, so far as I can discover, at the time of the massacre of St. Bartholomew. The bishop of London, in one of his letters to Lord Burleigh, expresses his fear lest so treacherous a beginning should have its continuation in England. He thinks the ground of this peril to be principally in the Scottish queen. "The security of the "kingdom," he declares, "demands that her head should be cut off."¹ But how much more powerful had the Catholic party now become in Europe! How much more violent was the excitement and commotion it was now causing in England itself! Mary Stuart maintained at all times a secret correspondence with her cousins the Guises, with the king of Spain, and the pope; she was in alliance with all the disaffected in England. The Catholic principle, in so far as it was from its nature opposed to the existing government, was represented by Mary Stuart. On the first success of the Catholic party, she would indubitably have been proclaimed queen of England. This was her position: it resulted from the state of things; but it is also certain that she made no attempt to withdraw from it, and it cost her the forfeit of her life.

¹ Dispaccio, Gritti, 10 Genn. 1587.

² "Dolendosi che 'l re si lascia strapazzar da una donna e vuol poi bravar con lei (Sua Santità)."

But this execution brought the plans of Philip and the pope to maturity. This was beyond what they could endure. Sixtus filled the consistory with his vociferations against the English Jezebel, who had laid hands on the anointed head of a princess subject to none but Jesus Christ, and, as she had herself acknowledged, to his vicegerent. To shew how cordially he approved of the activity displayed by the Catholic opposition in England, he raised William Allen, the first founder of the seminaries, to the dignity of cardinal; an elevation which was regarded, at least in Rome, as a declaration of war against England. A formal treaty was also now concluded between Philip and the pope,²—Sixtus promising the king a million scudi in aid of the enterprise; but as he was always on his guard, especially where money was in question, he pledged himself to pay it when Philip should have taken possession of an English sea-port.

¹ Edwin Sandys to Lord Burghley, Fulham, 5th of Sept. 1572: "The saftie of our quene and realme, yf God wil, fuitwith to cutte of the Scottish quenes heade; ipsa est nostri fundi calamitas."—Ellis's Letters, 2nd series, vol. iii. p. 25.

² The original views of the pope, Dispaccio Gritti, 27 Giugno, 1587: "Il papa fa gran offerta al re per l'impresa d'Inghilterra, ma vuole la denomination del re e che'l regno sia feudo della chiesa." [The pope made a large offer to the king for the expedition against England, but he wishes to have the nomination of the king, and that the kingdom shall be a fief of the Church.]

"Let your majesty no longer delay," he wrote to the king, "for all delay will tend to change a good intention into a bad performance!" Philip called every resource of his kingdom into action, and fitted out the Armada called the "Invincible."

And thus the powers of Italy and Spain, from which so mighty an influence had gone forth over the whole world, aroused themselves for an attack upon England. The king had caused a collection to be made from the archives of Simancas, of all the claims he possessed to the English throne on the extinction of the line of Stuart. The expedition was associated in his mind with the most brilliant prospects, especially that of universal dominion over the seas.

All things seemed now combining towards one result—the ascendancy of Catholicism in Germany, the renewed attack on the Huguenots in France, the attempt upon Geneva, the enterprise against England. At the same moment, a decidedly Catholic sovereign, Sigismund III, succeeded to the crown of Poland (an event of which we shall speak further hereafter), with the prospect of future accession to the throne of Sweden.

But whenever any principle, be it what it may, tends to the establishment of absolute dominion in Europe, there is invariably opposed to it a vigorous resistance, having its origin in the deepest springs of human nature.

Philip found himself confronted in England by the national energies in all the force of their youth, and elevated by the full consciousness of their destiny. The bold corsairs, who had rendered every sea unsafe, gathered around the coasts of their native land. The whole body of the Protestants, even the Puritans, although they had been oppressed as heavily as the Catholics, rallied around the queen, who now maintained to an admirable degree that masculine courage with which she was endowed, and gave proof of her princely talent of winning, retaining, and controlling the minds of men. The insular position of the country, and even the elements, co-operated to the defence of England. The invincible Armada was annihilated, even before the assault had been made; the expedition failed completely.

It is, nevertheless, evident that the plan, the great purpose itself, was not immediately abandoned.

The Catholics were reminded by the writers of their party that Julius Caesar, as well as Henry VII, the grandfather of Elizabeth, had both been unfortunate in their first attempts on England, but had at last become masters of the country,—that God often delayed the victory of the faithful. The children of Israel, in the war that they had undertaken by express command of God, with the tribe of Benjamin, were twice beaten with great loss. It was not until the third attack that they gained the victory: "Then, the devouring flames made desolate all the towns and villages of Benjamin,—men and cattle were slain by the edge of the sword." "Therefore," they exclaimed, "let the English ponder on these things, and not be too much elated because their chastisement is delayed."¹

Neither had Philip of Spain by any means lost his courage. He proposed to fit out smaller and more easily-managed vessels, and with these at once to attempt a landing on the English coast, without waiting in the Channel to be joined by the force of the Netherlands. In the arsenal at Lisbon preparations proceeded with the utmost activity. The king was resolved to stake every thing upon the undertaking, even should he be obliged, as he once said at table, to sell the silver candlesticks that stood before him.²

But while this project was occupying his thoughts, other prospects were opened to his view,—a new theatre presented itself for the activity of the powers wielded by Roman Catholicism as now represented by Spain and Italy.

¹ Andreae Philopatri (Parsoni) ad Elizabethae reginae Angliae edictum responsio, §§ 146, 147: "Nulla," he adds, "ipsorum fortitudine repulsa vis est, sed iis potius casibus, qui saepissime in res bellicas solent incidere, aeris nimirum inclementia, maris incogniti inesperienza nonnullorumque fortassis hominum vel negligentia vel inscitia, Dei denique voluntate, quia forte misericors dominus arborem infructuosam dimittere adhuc voluit ad tertium annum evangelicum."

² Dispacçi Gradenigo, 29 Sett. 1588: "Si come il re ha sentito molto questo accidente di mala fortuna, così mostra di esser più che mai risoluto di seguitar la impresa con tutte le sue forze."—11 Ott.: "S. M^{te} sta ardentissima nel pensar e trattar le provisioni per l'anno futuro."—1 Nov.: "Si venderanno," the king exclaimed, "estì candellieri, quando non vi sija altro modo di far danari."

13. ASSASSINATION OF HENRY III

A short time after the calamitous dispersion of the Spanish fleet, a reaction took place in France, unlooked for, and, as so frequently has been the case, violent and sanguinary.

At the moment when the duke of Guise, who ruled the states of Blois at his will, seemed, by virtue of his office of constable, to be on the point of gathering the whole power of the kingdom into his hands, Henry III caused him to be assassinated. That king, perceiving himself beset and enchained by the Spanish and Catholic party, tore himself at once from their trammels, and placed himself in direct opposition to them.

But the death of Guise did not extinguish his party nor annihilate the League. This latter assumed for the first time a position of undisguised hostility, and allied itself more closely than ever with Spain.

Pope Sixtus was entirely on the side of this party.

The assassination of the duke, whom he loved and admired, and in whom he beheld a pillar of the Church, had already caused him extreme regret and indignation;¹ he found it an insufferable addition when Cardinal Guise was also murdered. "A cardinal-priest!" he exclaimed in the consistory, "a noble member of the Holy See, without process or judgment, by the secular arm, as if there were no pope in the world, as if there were no longer any God!" He reproached his legate Morosini for not having instantly excommunicated the king. He ought to have done it even though it had cost him a hundred times his life.²

¹ The pope also complained very particularly that Henry III had contrived to obtain a brief from him "che li concesse poter esse assolto da qualsivoglia peccato anco riservato alla sede apostolica, col quale si voglia hora coprire il grave peccato che ha fatto" [which conceded to him the power of being absolved from any sin whatsoever, if still reserved to the Apostolic See, and with which he now desires to cover the heavy offence that he has committed.] (Dispaccio Veneto).^{*}

² Tempesti, ii. 137, gives both the speech of the pope at full length, and the letter to Morosini: "Essendo ammazzato il cardinale," it says,

The king was but slightly disturbed by the pope's indignation, and could not be induced to give liberty to Cardinal Bourbon, or the archbishop of Lyons, whom he had also imprisoned. He was continually urged by the Roman court to declare Henry of Navarre incapable of succeeding to the throne, but instead of doing so, he entered into alliance with him.

The pope then resolved to adopt measures of the uttermost severity; he cited the king to appear in person at the court of Rome, there to render an account for having murdered a cardinal, and threatened him with excommunication if he failed to release his prisoners within a specified time.

Sixtus declared that he was bound to act thus; should he do otherwise, he must answer for it to God as the most useless of pontiffs; but since he had thus fulfilled his duty, he need not fear the whole world; he made no doubt that Henry III would perish as King Saul had done.¹

By the zealous Catholics and the adherents of the League, the king was abhorred as a reprobate and outcast, and the demonstrations of the pope confirmed them in their violent opposition. Before it could have been expected, his prediction was fulfilled. On the 23rd of June the Monitorium was published in France; on the 1st of August the king was assassinated by Clement.

The pope himself was amazed: "In the midst of his army," he exclaimed, "on the point of conquering Paris, in his own cabinet, he has been struck down by a poor monk, and at one blow." He attributed this to the immediate intervention of God, who thereby testified that he would not abandon France.²

"in faccia di V. S.^{ria} Ill^{ma}, legato a latere, come non ha pubblicato l'interdetto, ancorchè gliene fossero andate cento vite?"

¹ Dispaccio Veneto, 20 Maggio, 1589: "Il papa accusa la sua negligentia di non haver fatto, dipoi mesi 5 che gli è stato ammazzato un cardinale e tenutone un' altro prigionero con un arcivescovo, alcuna rimostrazione o provisione. Dubita dell' ira di Dio, &c." [The pope accuses himself of negligence for not having made any remonstrance, or taken other steps, during five months that have elapsed since one cardinal has been assassinated, and another, with an archbishop, kept prisoner; he fears the wrath of God, &c.]

² Dispaccio Veneto, 1 Sett.: "Il papa nel consistorio discorre, che
VOL. I. 2 N

How is it that an opinion so erroneous can possibly have gained possession of the minds of men? This conviction prevailed among innumerable Catholics; "It is to the hand of the Almighty alone," wrote Mendoza to Philip, "that we must ascribe this happy event."¹ In the distant university of Ingolstadt, the young Maximilian of Bavaria was then pursuing his studies, and in one of the first letters from his hands remaining to our days, he expresses to his mother the joy which he had received from the intelligence that "the king of France had been killed."²

This occurrence had nevertheless another and less auspicious aspect; Henry of Navarre, whom the pope had excommunicated, and whom the Guises so rancorously persecuted, now succeeded to his legitimate rights,—a Protestant assumed the title of king of France.

The League, Philip II, and the pope were resolved that they would not suffer him on any condition to attain to the enjoyment of his kingdom. The pope sent a new legate to France in the place of Morosini, who appeared to be much too lukewarm. This was Gaetano, who was believed to be disposed to the Spanish party, and the pontiff gave him a sum of money, a thing he had never done before, to be applied as might be most advantageous for the purposes of the League. He was commanded above all things to take care that no other than a Catholic should be king of France. The crown ought without doubt to belong to a prince of the blood, but that was not the only condition to be insisted on; the strict order of hereditary succession had more than once been departed from, but never had a heretic been accepted; the first essential was that the king should be a good Catholic.³

¹ Il successo della morte del re di Francia si ha da conoscere dal voler espresso del Signor Dio, e che perciò si doveva confidar che continuerebbe al haver quel regno nella sua protezione."

² Caefigue, v. 290.

³ Wolf, Maximilian I, pt. i. p. 107.

³ Dispaccio Veneto 30 Sett. The pope declares: "che non importava che 'l fosse eletto piu del sangue che di altra famiglia, essendo ciò altre volte occorso, ma mai eretico dopo la nostra religione: che Savoia, Lorena e forse anche Umena pretendeva la corona: che S. S^{ta} non vuol favorir l'uno piu che l'altro." Extract from the Instruction in Tempesti,

In this disposition of mind the pope considered it even 'praiseworthy in the duke of Savoy, that he had taken advantage of the disorders prevailing in France, to gain possession of Saluzzo, which then belonged to the French. It was better, Sixtus declared, that the duke should take it than that it should fall into the hands of the heretics.¹

And now every thing depended on securing that the League should be victorious in the conflict with Henry IV.

To this effect a new treaty was concluded between Spain and the pope. The most zealous of the Inquisitors, Cardinal Sanseverina, was intrusted, under the seal of confession, with the arrangement of the terms. The pope promised to send without fail an army of fifteen thousand foot and eight hundred horse into France, and further declared himself ready to furnish subsidies when the king should have penetrated with a powerful army into that kingdom; the papal forces were to be commanded by the duke of Urbino, a subject of the pope and an adherent of the king of Spain.²

And thus were these Spanish and Italian powers, combined with their adherents in France, prepared in arms to secure the throne of that country to their party for ever.

A more attractive prospect could not have been laid open, either to the Spanish sovereign or the pope. Philip would render himself and his successors for ever free from that ancient rivalry by which the efforts of Spain had so long been restricted; the sequel showed how much he had it at heart. For the papal power also it would have been an immense advance to have exercised an active influence in placing a sovereign on the throne of France. Gaetano was accordingly directed to demand the introduction of the

ii. 233. Among other documents is a letter from the pope to King Philip II, in which he speaks of the raising of the siege of Paris after the death of Henry III: it is to be attributed to God and the Virgin, to the King of Spain and his ambassador, Mendoza: "da dio benedetto et dall' intercessione della beatissima vergine di Loreto, alla quale questa villa fece un publico voto." 21 Ag. 1590.

¹ The pope was reproached on that account: "il papa si giustifica con molte ragioni della impresa che'l sopradetto duca ha fatto del marchesato di Saluzzo con sua participatione." (Dispaccio Veneto.)

² Authentic information in the autobiography of the cardinal, adopted by Tempesti, ii. 236.

Inquisition, and the abolition of the privileges claimed by the Gallican church ; but the most significant of all triumphs would have been exclusion of a legitimate prince from the throne, on considerations purely religious ; the ecclesiastical impulse then pervading the world in all directions would thereby have achieved complete supremacy.

END OF VOL. I